Make The Children Happy With A Set Of These New Dressing Dolls!

The Little Folks Love To Play With These Large, Handsome Life-Like Dolls Which May Be Dressed In So Many Different Beautiful Costumes. Over A Foot Tall, Printed In Gorgeous Colors, Ready To Be Dressed When You Receive Them.

VES—this is the most delightful family of dolls that, any little girl or boy ever had to play with. The children enjoy them because they are something entirely new and different from all other dolls. Even the most expensive imported dressed dolls do not begin to furnish the little ones with the amusement and joy to be derived from these dear little boy and girl dressing doils with their bright happy faces and so many different changes of suits, dreases and so many different changes of suits, dreases and has a most sumptuous wardrobe consisting of a pretty checked holliday dress, a sanoy little hat with feather, white socks and slippers, a school dress and so many different changes of suits, dreases and has three different little dones where all the newest ideas are first put on the sale these large handsomely attired lifelike dolls are going into all the rich homes where there are little ones and they are fast taking the place of the more costly and elaborate dolls and other toys, because the dildren never tire of them. These dolls are of course in the small so-called "cut out" paper dolls but are actually 14 inches in height, printed in the most beautiful lifelike colors on thick heavy cardboard and so made that they will stand upright in almost any position you wish to place them. But the best part of all is that you can dress and undress them as often as you wish. We not only give you the dolls but all the extra different, beautiful suits, dresses and hats that go with them. Each doll has three different suits or dresses and three different dresses and hats that go with them. Each doll has three different suits or dresses and three different hats and there are three dolls and nine different dresses and hats in all.

This very minute cannot you see, in your mind's eye, these fresh blooming beauties growing luxuriantly beside the fence, along the walk, climbing in delightful profusion up the side of your house or porch, or forming a rich, brilliantly shaded canopy over the doorway? Can not you imagine the pleasure of going out and cutting loads of these beautiful fragrant flowers—as many as you want—any time you

These Roses Will Bloom And Bloom All Summer

Their wealth of blossoms and radiant colors will transform your home surroundings into a flowery paradise. And to think that all this pleasure can be yours with really less effort than it takes for us to write this offer and place it before you. By special arrangement with the largest and best known florists in the United States COMFORT offers you twelve of the finest Hardy Everblooming Roses in cultivation—and to insure your complete success in growing them we will also send you special printed instructions on their planting and culture. There are eight different varieties in the assortment and each of them is absolutely the prize of its class, noted for its hardy vigorous habit of growth, liberal blooming qualities, symmetrical form and bright clean foliage. You should have no trouble at all in growing them. They will thrive in any good garden soil if given a little care and attention. Each bush is one year old and in a growing Their wealth of blossoms and radiant colors will transform your condition when delivered to you. With the exception of the climber, all of them should bloom soon after planting.

No matter in what part of the country you live our florists will send the bushes at the proper time to plant according to the schedule printed below. In event of an early or late spring these dates may vary a little but, you can depend upon us to forward them at just the right time for you to place them in the ground. You will receive the bushes, packed in damp moss, by prepaid parcel post, and we guarantee that they will reach you in perfect condition. If for any reason they do not, or if any of the bushes fail to grow or otherwise prove unsatisfactory, we will replace them for you free of all cost. Following are brief descriptions of the different varieties of beautiful ever-blooming rose bushes given you free on this great offer. Please read them and remember that it is not too early to send in your order today.

Club Of Three!

THESE roses are grown by the largest, best I known firm of florists in the country. Our contract with them provides that every bush sent out must give absolute satisfaction to our subscribers. They are to replace free of all cost any bush that fails to bloom. Please remember, therefore, that in accepting this offer you take absolutely no chances of being disappointed. These bushes are one year old, well rooted, and will be de-livered to you in a healthy growing condition, covered with bright clean foliage. Just before shipment they are packed in damp moss and this keeps them perfectly fresh and green during the time they are on the way to you. They are ready to be planted as soon as you receive them. Place them in any good garden soil, give them ordinary care and attention and in a little while you will have a garden of roses that will prove a never ending source of delight to yourself and win the admiration of all your neighbors and friends.

The time for planting roses varies according to the locality in which you live. The date may also vary a little in event of an early or late spring. However, you may depend upon us to forward your bushes at the proper time for you to put them in the ground.

Mrs. Folly Hobbs

A DELICATE ivory white rose—one of the most delightful and showiest of recent years and absolutely distinct—there is no other white rose quite like it. Its rich green foliage is unusually thick and close set forming a plant of rare beauty. Its fragrance is superb and it produces an abundance of large magnificent blossoms with thick shell-shaped petals on long stiff stems.

Etoile De Lyon

THIS is a deep golden yellow rose, marvelously rich and pure, with an exquisite fragrance. The blossoms are beautifully formed, large, full and double and of splendid substance—the texture being very thick and lasting. It is an unusually strong grower quickly forming a stout hardy bush and producing a profusion of glorious flowers on long stems all summer. Grace of form, charm of color and vigor of growth are three characteristics which make this one of the finest roses ever offered.

Rosemary

A RICH silvery pink rose that is as beautiful as its name. It is very vigorous and hardy, will withstand all extremes of climate and quickly forms a handsome shapely bush the first season planted. It flowers practically all the time—from early spring until late fall—producing masses of blossoms brilliant in effect and exquisitely lovely, but most difficult to describe.

Meteor

FOR an intense rich, velvety crimson, there is no other rose to compare with this splendid new variety. It represents a new color in its class and is fast becoming the greatest of all crimson roses for home cultivation. It is always in bloom and its large handsome double flowers are produced in great quantities. It is a hardy plant with a vigorous rapid growth. "Meteor" is the premier crimson rose of today and its numerous charms will delight you.

Red La France

A DEEL, warm glowing red rose. There is no other like it, either in growth or beauty. It is the ideal garden rose, thriving to perfection in any soil under the most adverse conditions. The blossoms are marvels of loveliness, composed of heavy satiny petals and stand out well from the plant giving it a most regal appearance. This beautiful variety is without question one of the finest of all garden roses,

Lady Gay

O'NE of the finest climbing roses ever grown, producing a perfect riot of bloom in large clusters of a beautiful bright cherry pink color. Hardy as an oak it grows causes from twelve to fifteen feet in length in one season and so is admirably suited for training around porches, pillars, trellises and walls. Both flowers and foliage are of excellent substance and withstand unfavorable conditions better than any other variety. The blossoms retain their bright color and luster as long as the season lasts.

Red Letter Day

A NEW prize-winning crimson rose of rare beauty. Its velvety, glowing scarlet buds and flowers which are without a tinge of purple are produced on long stems freely and continuously. Its beautiful dark green foliage and profuse blooming qualities combined with absolute hardiness make this one of the finest roses for massing and bedding ever produced.

My Maryland

THIS is a great outdoor rose of extreme hardiness and as such is greatly admired by all true lovers of flowers. It has an indescribable charm that is all its own. Its color is a brilliant, lively shade of pink which gradually deepens as the flower expands until the whole bush fairly glows with warm, rich color and delightful fragrance. In this rose you have the rare combination of a poetic name and exquisite beauty. this rose you liquisite beauty.

Point of the Story

A visitor to a Sunday school was asked to address a few remarks to the children. He took the familiar theme of the little ones who mocked Elisha on his journey ones who mocked Elisha on his journey to Bethel—how the young ones taunted the prophet and how they were punished when two she bears came out of the woods and ate 42 of them.

"And now, children," said he "what does this story show?"

"Please, sir," came from a little girl in the front row, "it shows how many children two bears can hold!"—Boston Post.

George, aged eight, had just become acquainted with Bess, aged six.
"Do your folks have prayers before breakfast?" asked George.
"No," replied Bess, "we have prayers before we go to bed. We ain't afraid in the daytime."

Keep Hens, Produce Eggs, Raise Chickens, Other Poultry, too, if You Have a Place for Them

EVER did Eggs and poultry command such high prices, and, with the demand for them increasing and the supply diminishing, there is every indication of higher prices with the sky the limit, especially for eggs. There is a prospect of good profit in keeping hens, both for egg production and for poultry, notwithstanding the high price of feed which has induced so many to reduce their flocks that there is danger of an egg and poultry famine. And this danger is so imminent that the U. S. Food Administration has prohibited the sale of hens and pullets for food during ten weeks beginning February 11, except birds shipped to market or put in cold storage before the order went into effect. The purpose is to prevent further scarcity of eggs and diminution of the flocks this spring.

This prohibition will cause a heavy drain and large depletion of the stock of poultry in cold storage. The demand for poultry has been given a further boost by the Food Administrator's ruling that fowl may be served and eaten on meatless days when the use of beef, lamb, mutton, pork and veal is forbidden. Everybody who has a back yard and shed should fit up and keep some hens, if possible, enough to provide the family with eggs, and raise poultry for the home table. Not much space is needed for that, and the farmers and others who have more land and larger accommodations should increase their flocks. Work your incubators and brooders to the limit of their capacity. Those wishing to start in a small way can do so by purchasing day-old chicks. For those favorably situated there will be good money in raising turkeys, ducks and geese. Help win the war and at the same time make a profit yourself by raising fowl for egg production and poultry.

More War Gardens Needed

LTHOUGH, because of bad weather and an unusual prevalence of insect pests, the season was most unfavorable last year's war gardens as a whole were successful and did much to help supply the tables of their owners and to relieve the strain on our overtaxed national food supply. The food question is daily becoming more troublesome and the outlook is positively alarming. The world is facing famine. and if the wolf of hunger is to be kept from the door of the American home we must all, not only practice strict economy in the use of food, but also do our utmost to increase the production of food. The slogan has been "Food Will Win the War," but if we do not produce the food--which means more food than ever before—we shall lose the war and starve. Therefore the necessity for more and larger war gardens.

To the farmers we must look for increased production of wheat, corn, rice, field beans and other staple crops, and the Government must take effective measures at once to help them overcome the shortage of labor, seed and fertilizer, and to encourage them by guaranteeing remunerative prices for their products, as we pointed out in our February editorial. But there is urgent need that the utmost efforts of the farmers should be supplemented by back-yard gardens. In the cities, towns and villages everybody who has a back yard or can get the use of a plot of land should plant a vegetable garden. It will be an important saving in the cost of living by supplying fresh vegetables in season and, if the surplus is canned, through the winter also.

Because of the scarcity and high cost of labor the men on the farms will be so busy with the large crops that they may think they can not spare the time to bother with the home garden this year. It would be a great mistake to neglect the garden, and if the men are too busy or indifferent the women should see to it. Under the mother's supervision and with a little help the children can plant and care for a small but worthwhile garden. It need not be hard work, and with proper encouragement they will take an interest in it. There is a scarcity of seed of all kinds this spring and those who do not buy early are likely to be disappointed in finding the supply exhausted. Some seed houses already are refusing to fill large orders.

Zone Rate Postage Hardship to People Living far from Publishing Centers

OME Congressmen have sense enough to oppose, and courage enough to denounce the application of the zone rate system to second-class mail (magazine and newspaper) matter as a hardship and an injustice to the people who live far from the publishing centers. They also condemn it on the broader ground that it will be detrimental to the general welfare by promoting ignorance, impeding progress and standing as an obstacle in the path of national unity.

Miss Jeanette Rankin, member of Congress from Montana, who has the distinction of being the first and only woman elected to Congress, voted against the zone rate bill when it was adopted, last October, and is now aiding in the effort to get it repealed. In recent letters she gives her reasons as follows:

"I do not approve of the zone system and voted against it in Congress. * * * * * The fact is, that, coming from Montana, I understand perfectly what hardships the zone system imposes on people living far from the publishing centers: Furthermore, most of the magazines have an educational influence, in many instances constitute the only form of education, and this tax is likely to put them out of the reach of these people. * * * * I know how unfair the zone system is when it is considered that the great publishing centers are mostly all in the East."

These zone rates of magazine postage were foisted on the country as one of the tax features of the War Revenue Bill for the purpose, as it was claimed, of increasing the war revenues. The hollowness of this pretense has been exposed in one of our previous editorials, and Miss Rankin's opinion that the zone rate system will not prove profitable to the Government is thus expressed: "I believe that this tax will be useless as a war tax, for it will defeat its own ends." In other words, the zone rates will put the magazines out of the reach of so many people as to cause a large reduction of circulation and a corresponding loss of postage income equal to or exceeding any gain through higher rates.

Undoubtedly Miss Rankin is right in her prediction. Her opinion coincides with that of the publishers and others in a position to judge. She knows the people of her own State, how are situated and how they will be affected. There are, in other States, millions of people similarly situated who will be affected in like manner. Take, for instance, the great State of Texas in which Comfort has rising ninety-seven thousand subscribers. The line between the seventh and eighth zones divides Texas so that more than half the State comes within the eighth zone and the other part within the seventh zone from Augusta, Maine. All of New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Nevada, California, Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, and the larger part of Montana, Wyoming and Colorado are in the eighth zone. The rest of Montana, Wyoming and Colorado, all of Oklahoma and Louisiana, a part of Florida and Alabama, nearly half of Mississippi and Arkansas, and the most of Kansas, Nebraska and the two Dakotas come within the seventh zone. But look on the map in February Comfort and see for yourself what zone you are in as a Comfort subscriber.

Some other objectionable aspects of the zone rate proposition are concisely and forcibly stated in the following expressions of opinion by other members of Congress. Hon. Henry Z. Osborn, of California, in addressing the House said; "I object to the zone system, because it tends to denationalize our governmental system." Congressman George R. Lunn, of New York State, writes; "The zone system, as completed, I consider absolutely dangerous. It will make the people provincial. * * * * A great many people seem to think that a postal system is run as a moneymaking proposition. I do not so consider it. think of it first as a public service agency. It constitutes a great University of Democracy. Cheap rates on periodicals do more to educate the masses of the people than any other one thing." Congressman Stuart F. Reed, of West Virginia, is for uniform, level rates, and he writes: American people should be treated as equal, and the burden should not be borne unequally by any particular class or classes." Congressman Martin D. Madden, of Chicago, says: "If there ever was a time when national thought was needed, this is the time. * * * * The nation should be one in thought and action; it should not be divided into segments, and I know of no better way to force a division than to create zones within which literature must be distributed, if distributed at all." Hon. Frederick D. Gardner, Governor of Missouri, says: "I am in favor of low postal rates for newspapers and periodicals of all kinds, because they not only stimulate industry, which is so necessary at the present time, but they educate the masses of our people, which is also vital at this time."

These and a number of other Congressmen, who hold the same views, are laboring, with the aid of certain Senators, to get the zone rate system abolished before it goes into effect next July; but they are in a minority, and when it comes to a vote the cause will be lost, unless enough Congressmen can be won over, from the ranks of those who stand for zone rates, to turn the scale. If you are in favor of equal rights and postal privileges and uniform rates for all, write to your Congressman or cut out the petition printed on page 24, sign it, get your friends to sign it and then mail it to your Congressman at Washington. If he is already favorable, it will give him ammunition to fight with; and if he is now opposed, it may open his eyes to the light of reason and perhaps make a convert of him. The people's rights are at stake; it is the people's fight, it is your fight, and if you will not do your part to help those who are fighting your battle in Congress, how can you expect to win?

N the map which we printed on page 3 of February Comfort and in our editorial which accompanied it, we stated that the postage rate on newspapers and magazines is One-Half cent per pound in Canada. We did this on information from a reputable and, as we believed, reliable source. But we have just now received a communication direct from the Deputy Postmaster General of Canada informing us that the rate on newspapers and magazines published in Canada is A Quarter of a cent per pound throughout Canada and to any place in Great Britain, Mexico and certain British Possessions.

The fact is that our statement that the new rates in the United States (recently adopted but not yet in effect) are "3 to 20 times the Canadian rate," should have read 6 to 40 times the Canadian rate. With these corrections in mind, kindly take another look at our February editorial and map. We were too conservative in our previous claims. The truth doubles our statement of the difference between the Canadian rate and the rates in the United States, and makes the comparison still more startlingly impressive. Will you stand for Magazine postage rates 6 to 40 times the Canadian rate?

PART L.

URSE the luck!" Randolph Noble kicked his bags into place, settled himself in a corner of his seat, and for a half-hour after his train left Albany, quite frankly sulked. The unusual experience of herding with the great unwashed—his own words—in an ordinary day coach made a disagreeable conclusion to his tedious annual pilgrimage home, where his aging and disappointed father invariably discoursed at length on the desirability of a business career for his only son in the smoky, forgy factory town of his birth.

Noble was a personable youth, under thirty yet, but with lines already etching their way about his cynical mouth and eyes, and with a figure thickening from over-indulgence.

Pre-ently, having turned from his gloomy observation of the darkening landscape, Noble's eyes fell and lingered upon the girl across the giste. Precisely what attracted him he would have been at loss to have told, for her face, turned steadfastly to her window, was hidden from him, but whatever mysterious quality it was, it was affecting others also, as his hasty glance about him confirmed.

It might have been her absolute immobility as she sat braced against the joiting of the train; it might have been her youth—one could see youth in the dazzling whiteness of her slender throat and in the heaviness of her simply-coiled, drisky hair; it might even have been sympathy, for the simple black of her garments was the insignia of a recent bereavement.

Whatever it was, it successfully chained Noble's interest. Once he made a journey into the smoking compartment on the chance that on his return he might surprise a glimpse of her face. It was futile. To her absorbed mind, her fellowinvelers did not exist.

When, finally, the train neared the city, Noble fancied that the girl's figure became even more rizid, and that her hands, lying idle in her lap, elenched nervously, and obeying an impulse which her gave himself no time to ridicule, he crossed the aisle.

"I beg your pardon," he began, bending above ther, "but we are approaching New York.

clenched nervously, and obeying an impulse which he gave himself no time to ridicule, he crossed the aisle.

"I beg your pardon," he began, bending above her, "but we are approaching New York. It is rather late, you know. Can I be of any assistance to you?"

Ceclly Alden did not turn her head. "Only by going away," she answered distinctly.

Noble paused only for one discomforted look over the girl's outraged shoulder, and then, feeling like a chidden schoolboy, he lifted his hat and left the car to avoid the amused and curious eyes of the witnesses of his rebuff.

"I deserve what I got," he mused ruefully: "of all the asinine things for a man to do! Well, she has demonstrated the fact that she can take care of herself."

When Noble stepped from the train at the Terminal, he discovered that Cecily had preceded him and had halted uncertainly, a slight confusion in her manner. He was not prepared for the elusive charm of the face which she turned toward him.

It was a colorless face, broad of brow and him and had halted uncertainly, a slight confusion in her manner. He was not prepared for the elusive charm of the face which she turned toward him.

It was a colorless face, broad of brow and ending in a firm, small chin, and it was accented by smoldering gray eyes whose large, dark pupils deceived one into thinking them black. Her sensitive, scarlet mouth was slightly tremulous. "I am going to disprove the popular belief that a burnt child dreads the fire." Noble approached her, hat in hand, to say. "You see, I am the presumptuous person whom you recently and reasonably scorned. However, I am a forgiving brute." He smiled disarmingly. "Please." he added in a more serious voice, "please don't think that I am trying to be offensive, but if, as I suspect, you are a stranger in the city and no one is meeting you.—"

"I know precisely where to go." Cecily cut him short to say, but Noble felt that the serene assurance had left her voice.

"Of course. Perhaps you will permit me to take you to a taxicab."

"No, thank you." But she lingered uncertainly. "Wouldn't it be better to tell me just where you wish to go?" There was an edge of annoyance in Noble's voice which, perhaps, reassured Cecily, for she opened her bag and removed a slip of paper, handing it to him silently.

Noble plucked reflectively at his lip as he studied the address. "It's one of those working-girls' hang outs, isn't it?" he said. "Do you know how to get there?"

"To might, but I wouldn't if I were you. I will see that you get there safely."

He grinned at the frightened gesture with which she denied him.

"Warned—what? Well, don't worry. I hadn't a thought of offering to take you there myself. In fact, I'm due somewhere else at this very moment. I am going to call a messenger boy to pilot you to the Mary-Jane house. You wouldn't be frightened with a uniformed attendant, would you?" He quizzically smiled into her serious eyes.

"You are very good," she said breathlessly, as they made their way to the waiting-room. "Please forgive me for being so s

"Please forgive me for being so suspicious."
"Oh, that is quite all right," Noble returned carelessly. "Now if you don't mind waiting right here, I will corral that boy," and before she had time to reply he had woven himself into the shifting pattern of the crowd.

In spite of herself, and angry because of it, Cecily was confused and troubled. She had not anticipated fright upon reaching the city of her dreams. To be sure, she came from a little Vermont town, but had she not had two enlightening years at college? She felt resentful because they had failed to prepare her for this—to fortress her against this rushing indifferent because they had tailed to prepare her for this to fortress her against this rushing indifferent throng.

Noble was back presently, a stalwart youth

Noble was back presently, a stalwart youth at his heels.

"Here we are, Miss—"
"My name is Cecily Alden."
"Corking! It makes me think instantly of spice cookies and mignonette."

The merest suggestion of a twinkle lighted Cecily's eyes. "The flesh first. How distinctly masculine! And you look to me like a man whose knowledge of the fragrance of mignonette is purely academic."

Her grave audacity was irresistible, but Noble flushed unaccountably. He suspected that this country girl was enjoying herself at his expense.

"I must be gone." The gravity had returned to her voice. Already she regretted her familiarity, "Thank you for making things so easy for a stranger."

stranger."

Noble drew out a card and scribbled on it. "The boy's number," he explained, handing it to her. "He will have you there in twenty minutes." "Thank you," she said again.

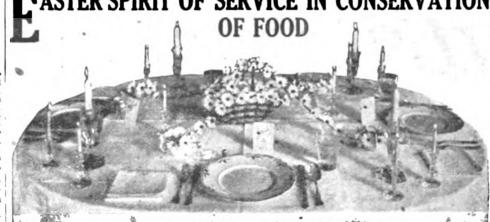

"I don't suppose there's a chance of my being able ever to see you at this Susan-Matilda place you're headed for?"

She shook her head, smiling. She was amazingly lovely when she smiled.

"It is good by, then? Well, I suppose I must bow to the inevitable. But if the time should come when you need a friend, will you remember me, Miss Alden? You won't lose my card? Good!" He held her black-gloved hand for a moment before she followed the boy away—a slender, swinging figure in its somber garb.

With a little sigh, Noble sought a taxicab and shot down to the studio which he rented from a rich, young matron, whose greed for adventure had led her out of Bohemia into France as a Red Cross nurse.

TASTER SPIRIT OF SERVICE IN CONSERVATION

HOUSANDS of Compost Sisters have become members of the Food Administration. The Government has accepted our signatures as a guarantee that we will fulfill the requirements set forth on the home card. We are soldiering in our own kitchens, adjusting old stand-by recipes to a larger use of the cheaper and more plentiful foods, which is not a simple matter. Wherever women congregate, the subject under discussion is what we can do Over Here to help win the war. American women everywhere are eager for new suggestions that will "sugar coat" war dishes, and their cleverness in camouflaging left-overs does credit to their versatility. In order that we may do our bit. Compost has practically given over its cooking department columns to assist in the mighty task of food conservation.

The spirit of self-denial is abroad in the land and every day strengthening. It shows in the Stir intil sukar dissolves, and strain. When the jelly begins to stiffen, add quarter of a cup of walnut meats, and two theids of a cup of cookel and chopped prunes. Stir occasionally while the jelly sets.

Arrived, he found a rather boisterous crowd of his studio friends making merry at his expense- in the transparent pretense of welcoming him back to civilization.

For once he greeted them a trifle absent-mindedly. He could have made an amusing story of his adventure at the Terminal, for Noble was clever with his word-pictures, but, curiously, he shrank from mentioning it, even to the tail girl with the reddish hair, whose jade-green eyes glimmered familiarly into his. Not even Cecily Alden's name seemed to belong in this exotic atmosphere.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Lady Prescott, wife of Sir Athelstone Prescott, and her son, Raymond, while traveling by coach, lose their way, and night overtaking them, they stop at a miserable inn, in a little fishing village on Flamborough Head. They are attracted to a little girl, Sibyl, who waits on them. Her winning ways, her admittance of the cruel blows given by Mistress Sloan, and that her own mother would not do it, convince them that the innkeeper is not her father, and they determine to take the child away. Seeking Mistress Sloan, they learn that a woman who had been in a railroad smash up and injured leaves the child, who for weeks eries for Nansle. Mistress Sloan, for the consideration of thirty pounds, consents to let the child go, muttering she will keep her secrets. That night Sibyl is awakened and overhears Jem and his wife talking over the terms of the bargain, and through a chink in the wall she detects the place where an invaluable trinket, belonging to her, is concealed. The next morning she secures it. To Lady Prescott she traces three letters "S. H. S.," which she dimly remembers and which convinces Lady Prescott that the gem is Sibyl's, and by it she may be restored to her own people. Five years later, her nineteenth birthday, Lady Prescott introduces her to society. She clasps a beautiful chain, to which is suspended the trinket, around her neck, and with Raymond they seek the drawing-room, where with Lady Prescott Sibyl assists in receiving the guests. Raymond, watching and anxious, admits to his mother how beautiful Sibyl is, and that no one attracts him as she does, and that his mother has the first right to his confidence. She will like nothing better than to keep her children with her. Sibyl is introduced to Miss Ada Therwin, the adopted daughter of Count Eghert Shirley and the guest of General Maplewood. Seized with a sudden faintness, Miss Therwin is carried to a quiet room. Sibyl remains with her. Regaining consciousness, Miss Therwyn refers to the ornament Sibyl wears, and t

CHAPTER X.

"SOME DAY."

ISS Therwin had played her cards very cleverly indeed, and when she bore Sibyl away on her drive she was jubilant indeed over her success. She meant to meet Raymond Prescott, and cast around him the glamour of her charms.

She meant to take Lady Prescott's heart by storm, and win the confidence of the proud but pure-hearted Sibyl.

She finally completed her coup d'etat, and her conquest of the unsuspecting girl, by saying to her driver, as they were passing some foriorn-looking cottages:

"Robert, please stop at Widow Martin's; I have a package to leave there; the poor woman is in sad want."

Robert stopped as directed, but it was a pity that Sibyl could not see the averaged. "SOME DAY."

and want.

Robert stopped as directed, but it was a pity that Sibyl could not see the expression upon his face—the lips drawn up as if for a whistle, and the eyes gleaming with the surprise he dare not express.

Miss Therwin excused herself for a moment, alighted, and entered the cottage, carrying in her own faultlessly gloved hands quite a good-sized package done up in brown paper. She was absent only a few moments, however, and entered the carriage again with a smiling apology upon her lips.

sized package done up in brown paper. She was absent only a few moments, however, and entered the carriage again with a smiling apology upon her lips.

"I am sorry to annoy you with this little errand," she said, "but a poor woman lives here who has come a number of times to General Maplewood's to obtain work since I have been there. She cannot get enough to do to support herself, and, feeling sympathy for her, I have been employing her to make some underclothing for two little orphan girls whom I have under the shelter of my wing at home."

She spoke carelessly, and as if what she was doing was of no moment; but from that hour she was to Sibyl a different woman from the gay, fashionable belle, to whom she had been introduced only three days ago.

She regarded her with an admiration almost amounting to reverence.

It was a work that she, out of the fullness and content of her own heart, had long been yearning to do, and her resolve was taken at once—she would ask the privilege of sharing Miss Therwin's charities while she remained in Dumfries, and assume them as her own, when she should return to her home.

"How happy you must be in doing such delightful deeds!" she said to Miss Therwin, while a beautiful earnestness shown in her lustrous eyes.

Her companion assented quietly, though the corners of her handsome mouth twitched just a trifle, as she saw how very satisfactorily her cunning plans were working.

"It is just what I have been longing to do for a great while, only—I did not quite know how or where to begin," Sibyl said, wistfully.

A lurid glare leaped into Ada Therwin's eyes at this remark. at this remark.

"Perhaps," she said modestly, "I could put you in a way to do a little good, if you would like."

"If I 'would'—I shrould like it above all things!" Sibyl exclaimed, eagerly.

"It is not often that one so young as you cares to interest one's self in the poor and friendless," Miss Therwin remarked.

"I have always felt a deep interest in the poor and neglected."

"That is very good of you, and unusually

"That is very good of you, and unusually thoughtful in one who has never known the rough side of life, but, on the contrary, has always been so tenderly shielded as you have been," said Miss Therwin, artfully.

Sibyl's face paled a triffe at this remark, but she simply said, in reply:

"Yes, auntie has been very kind to me."

"And you are very happy with her?"

"Yes, indeed; but—"

"But what, dear?" Ada said, sweetly, seeing the far-away, wistful look in the dusky eyes.

"But one longs for one's own mother," you know," Sibyl replied, won into this expression of confidence by her companion's sweetness and sympathy.

of confidence by her companion's sweetness and sympathy.

Ada reached out quickly and grasped Sibyl's little gloved hand, and turned a pair of pained, tearful eyes upon her.

"Dear Sibyl," she said, with a little quiver of her lips, "do I not also know what the longing is? I, too, am an orphan, and was adopted when I was ten years of age by a distant relative—the Countess of Shirley. She has ever been like a dear mother to me, but, as you say, the yearning for one's own is strong. How singular that we should be so similarly situated!"

"It is strange, Miss Therwin——"

"Call me Ada, please—I feel a new bond of sympathy unding us now—the bond of a common sorrow—that of being motherless," Miss Therwin interrupted, feelingly, and she gave the hand she still held a warmer clasp.

"Thank you, Ada," Sibyl replied, with a little flush and smile.

"Were you very young, Sibyl, when you lost."

still held a warmer clasp.

"Thank you, Ada," Sibyl replied, with a little flush and smile.

"Were you very young, Sibyl, when you lost your mother?" Ada asked, softly, reading her thoughts in her expressive face, and feeling that she was getting on swimmingly.

"I believe I was about three years of age."

Miss Therwin started.

"So young! How sad!" she murmured, tenderly. "Can you remember her, Sibyl?"

"No; and yet there are times when I am haunted by a vision of a beautiful face, with edge, tender eyes, and such a fond, loving smile, which, it seems to me, must be a faint remembrance of my mother's countenance," Sibyl returned, sadly, a pained look in her dark eyes. A sigh of relief from Miss Therwin followed this reply; then she asked:

"Where did your mother die, dear?"

"I do—I am not sure—oh, Ada! I do not even know that she is dead," cried the beautiful girl, trembling with excitement.

"Not dead!"

"No. There can be no harm in my telling you, since you feel so deeply with me; but it is supposed by auntie and others that I was traveling with my mother and nurse, when a fearful railroad accident occurred. It was not known whether she lost her life or not, but my nurse swas injured in such a way that she did not realize what she was about, and in the confusion wandered away to some distance from the scene of the disaster. Here she was sick for quite a while, getting no better all the time, and finally she left me and went away, no one who wanted way, no one bear to touch upon those first sad years of her life, even to one who appeared so sympathether and interested. "No: some people cared the tiend interested." "No: some people cared the tender and intere

"No," she answered, reluctantly. She could not bear to touch upon those first sad years of her life, even to one who appeared so sympathetic and interested. "No; some people cared for me until auntie found me, since then I have known nothing but happings. for me until auntie found me, since then I have known nothing but happiness, except that one wild longing for my own dear mother. But I will not weary you further with my vain repinings," she concluded, trying to smile away her sadness, and anxious, too, to change the subject.

Miss Therwin longed to question her more regarding how Lady Prescott found her, but she dared not.

"Your story is more sed than mine" she said.

"Your story is more sad than mine," she said, as if frankly meeting confidence for confidence, "for my mother died in her home,—though very suddenly of heart disease—when I was ten years old. My father had died several years previously. I had no brother or sister, or relative, excepting the Countess of Shirley, who was a cousin of my father's. 'She had no children of her own, and took me into her heart and home at once. But you—"

Ada stopped suddenly, as if she were about to say something which she should not.

Sibyl turned an inquiring glance upon her, and thus encouraged, she continued:
"You may find your mother, even yet." "Your story is more sad than mine," she said,

"You may find your mother, even yet."
"That is what I am always hoping," she "That is what I am always hoping," she said, her face growing radiant for the moment with the renewal of the eager hope which she had always clung to. "Everywhere I go I find myself looking for that beautiful face which I sometimes see in my dreams, and I listen for a voice which it seems as if I must know if I could only hear it again. I pray for it every day, and—yes, Ada, I do—I believe that some day I shall find my mother."

She spoke so confidently, and there was such a look of faith in her glorious eyes, that, instinctively, Miss Therwin shuddered as with the

She spoke so confidently, and there was such a look of faith in her glorious eyes, that, instinctively, Miss Therwin shuddered as with the cold.

If she could help it, she resolved Sibyl Prescott should never find her mother.

"You have one thing, at least, to guide you in your search—the beautiful jewel which you were showing me the other night," she said, craftily, to find out if Sibyl had entertained that hope also.

"Yes, the ornament probably belonged to a necklace or bracelet of my mother's, and I feel quite sure, that those letters, so strangely interwoven with the pearls, are the initials of her name. Sir Athelsione and Lady Prescott have never ceased to make inquiries, but, as yet, without success." Sibyl said, with a sigh.

"Poor child! hope deferred maketh the heart sick!" quoted Miss Therwin in her sweetest tones, but with an evil light in her cold, gray eyes that, it was well for her plans, Sibyl could not see.

"No," Sibyl replied, with a steadfast faith, at which her companion marveled, though there was a look of unutterable yearning in her delicate face, "no, I do not get 'heart-sick,' though I think no one can realize how much I long for my mother; yet, if I am never permitted to see her dear face on earth, I feel that it is all right—I shall not murmur, for I have known more of happiness, and have more in prospect, than very many who have had their own parents to love them all their life."

Ada searched the fair face keenly as Sibyl said this, wondering if her words contained any hidden meaning—wondering if in her heart she was hoping some day to become Raymond Prescott's wife, and that was what she had in prospect.

The conversation was becoming irksome to her. Her gray eyes diltared eand her lips were drawn

The conversation was becoming irksome to her.
Her gray eyes glittered and her lips were drawn into a firm, straight line. She shivered, and, turning to the driver, remarked:
"Robert, it is getting chilly, and I think we will return," and, turning the subject with the horses' heads, they chatted gayly during the remainder of the homeward drive.

CHAPTER XI.

THE PLOTTERS' CONFERENCE.

The plotters' conference.

The morning following her drive with Sibyl, Miss Therwin excused herself to her hostess after breakfast, saying she had letters to write, and, repairing to her own rooms, several hours were devoted to assiduous work at her writing desk. She arrayed herself in her street costume and went below. Dropping two letters in the silver salver which stood on the hall table for that purpose, she retained a third in her hand, and then passed quickly and noiselessly into the street.

She was closely yeiled, but her book and the passed and the passed of the street.

then passed quickly and noiselessly into the street.

She was closely veiled, but her keen eyes were nevertheless on the alert, noting every one whom she passed.

At length she paused before a letter box upon a street corner, and after glancing around as if fearful of observation, she quickly dropped the letter she had retained into it, when, turning, she hastily retraced her steps homeward.

She fegained her own apartments without encountering any one, removed her street costume, and, replacing it with an elegant home robe, she then sat down to think and rest.

"I must manage so that Annie and the general will not have a suspicion as to who Judith is, for that would ruin all," she mused, and then fell into a deep study again.

Annie was the young wife of the distinguished general. She had been an intimate friend of Ada's while at school, and upon græduating had become acquainted with the military gentleman, who was a widower of about fifty.

Their mutual admiration had soon ripened into a warmer sentiment. which resulted in the gen-

Their mutual admiration had soon ripened into a warmer sentiment, which resulted in the general carrying off the young and charming Annie to his splendid Northern home, where she had insisted Ada should come to spend the winter with her, and share her society honors. Consequently, she was introduced wherever they went, and thus it happened that she was present at Sibyl's birthday reception.

Two days after the malling of the letter, just as the family were leaving the dinner table, a servant entered the room, saying that there was a woman in the housekeeper's room who had some rich laces which she was desirous of displaying to the ladies.

Miss Therwin was betrayed into a little bit of a start at this intelligence, but she waited with apparent indifference for Mrs. Maplewood's reply.

That lady said she was not in need of anything of the kind, and did not like to be annoyed by peddlers, anyway.

This reply seemed to suit Miss Therwin, for the expression of anxiety faded from her eyes, and she hastened to say:

"I would like to look at the laces, Annie, if you do not object, and if you will allow John to show her up to my room, I will make my purchases there, and you need not be troubled by her."

"Just like you, dear—I do not object, only these peddlers are such a nuisance; they will Their mutual admiration had soon ripened into

"Just like you, dear—I do not object, only these peddlers are such a nuisance; they will never let you off until you buy something, whether you want it or not," replied Mrs. Maplewood, laughing, and Ada went up to her boudoir to await her visitor.

She seemed strangely excited while walting walking the room with nervous tread, flushed cheeks and lowering brow.

Ere long a knock sounded upon her door.

At her "come in" it opened: a tall, dark woman, bearing a covered basket, entered, the servant shut the door, and the two women stood facing each other, a look of mutual recognition upon their faces.

"Well, Judith, you concluded to come, then," said Miss Therwin, sinking into a chair, with a long-drawn breath.

"Yes, Miss Ada, I could not refuse, considering the inducements which you offered. Will you examine mys laces?"

"Pshaw! no: you know well enough that I do not care anything about the laces—you may leave a piece or two, just for the name of the thing, however."

"I hope, though," she added, sharply, with a glance at the good-sized basket, "that you did not spend all the money I sent you just to gain access here."

"Not I, Miss Ada. Trust me for knowing the "Not I, Miss Ada. Trust me for knowing the best use to put gold to. Now, what is it you want of me?" she demanded.

"Take off your hat and cloak, and draw a chair close to me, and then I'll tell you. But first lock the door, so that no one can interrupt us," Ada continued, in low, eager tones.

The woman obeyed her as if accustomed to do so, and then sat down and fastened her eyes on the beautiful girl.

The stranger was as dark as Miss Therwin was fair.

She had the blackest of hair, eyes, and lashes; a dark, clear, though rather pale complexion, white, handsome teeth, regular features, and a tall, large, well-developed form.

She was apparently about forty years of age, and probably in her younger days was quite handsome, though, undoubtedly, with a rather coarse kind of beauty.

"It's a pity your children did not live to be a comfort to you as you grow old," Miss Therwin observed, with a keen glance into Judith's face.

"It would have been a greater pity if they

"It would have been a greater pity if they had lived," cried the woman, sternly, her face assuming a ghasty look. "Ugh!" she added, with a shiver, "don't you ever say that to me again, Miss Ada, for I loved the little things, for all they brought me so much trouble; but they are better dead than to live to know all they would have to know," she concluded, bitterly.

"I did not mean to pain you, Judith," Miss Therwin replied, with assumed gentleness; "but I was thinking how pleasant it would be for you if you only had a daughter to live with you now, and be a companion for you, as the years advance."

if you only had a daughter to live with you now, and be a companion for you, as the years advance."

"What are you driving at, Miss Ada? Out with it, and don't be beating round the bush any longer."

Miss Therwin colored, and then, with a nervous laugh, said:

"Of course, you are anxious to know why I sent for you in such peremptory haste, and I've a story to tell you which will make you open your eyes and prick up your ears, I assure you."

Then, dropping her voice, she talked in a quick, rapid manner for more than half an hour.

The woman was evidently greatly surprised and interested in her tale, and when she concluded she asked a few sharp-pointed questions, after which she sat in deep thought for a moment, Miss Therwin watching her intently, and somewhat anxiously, all the while.

"Well," she said, at length, "don't you think it necessary for something to be done?"

"No, if you could only be reasonable..."

"You know, Miss Ada, that there is nothing that I would not do for you if I could, and I'm not accustomed to be very soft-hearted, as a general thing, but..."

"Well?" demanded Miss Therwin, sharply, as Judith seemed undecided.

"But this is rather a hard fate you have decreed, I must say."

"The only alternative is ruin, utter and absolute, for me."

"I do not think so—why not let the truth come out? You would fare well enough, even "Never! Do you think I would be content to be second where I have always been first?" cried the girl, angrily; then, her eyes blazing with fury, she went on, "Judith, you shall do this thing for me, or I shall—"

She bent forward and whispered something to her companion.
Judith instantly grew crimson—almost purple, then pale again, and so agitated that for a few moments she actually panted for breath.
At length she sat suddenly erect, her face growing stern and gloomy, and said:
"Miss Ada; I should do more for you for the hold which you have on my heart, and for your dead mother's sake, than for any threats with which you may try to frighten me. Let me warn you that it will never be safe for you to say the same thing to me again, after knowing the facts with which you have put me in possession today."
"Come, come, Judith, I had no idea of offending

OME months ago a sister, who signed herself "V. Varied and many were the replies she received, and in case she has not solved the troublesome question, I am taking the liberty of quoting from the January number of Good Housekeeping, "Mirandy, On the One We Didn't Marry," by Dorothy Dix. I fear V. M. won't appreciate it, but it may help some one.

Lady Anniesley, disapproves of Adrian Gordon, who is in love with Ravenel. Receiving an appointment to India Adrian seals his proposal and Ravenel's promise for an early marriage, by giving her a beautiful ring of diamonds and opals. Not daring to wear it she silps it on a ribbon on her neck. Ravenel bids Adrian good by, unconscious that their conversation, held near the edge of a quarry is heard by Lady Annesley's confidential maid. Four days later Ravenel receives a letter from Adrian that he will go to the Duchess of Avonmore's party and names the following day for their marriage. Lady Annesley, apparently anxious for their marriage. Lady Annesley, apparently anxious for their marriage, but Sir Thomas, only sixteen, suspects the scheming woman and her designs on Lord Levallion, a former suitor for her hand, as Ravenel's future husband. Going to the party and not meeting Adrian, Ravenel, with a sob in her throat, wanders through the garden, where she meets Lord Levallion, not knowing it is he. Weary and wanting to go home he offers to take her there. Arriving home she hunts for the lost ring but does not find it. The next day Ravenal prepares for her wedding and waits for Adrian, who fails to meet her. Going home she enters the drawing-room, where she finds Lady Annesley and Lord Levallion, the latter telling her of his cousin Adrian Gordon's departure for India. The Duchess of Avonmore, to Lord Levallion's delight, takes Ravenal and Sir Thomas to her home. Ravenal is invited to Hester Murray's to lunch and at the instigation of Lady Annesley she gives Ravenal the impression that there is a Mrs. Gordon. Believing Adrian false she marries Lord Levallion. Coming from the altar, the groom sees a woman in black with a child clinging to her hand and wonders if Ravenal notices her. Three months later Adrian Gordon is reported missing. Lord Levallion goes to the War Office to learn the truth. Sitting alone on the fawn Ravenal sees Adrian an

HE drew away into the scant shelter of an evergreen, and pushed her wet, uncurled hair out of her eyes. She had no motive for staying here shivering and drenched, but the air and the rain even were better than sitting alone by her solitary fireside, when no one of all the people she had ever asked to dinner would dream of coming to see her. Once start the truth about a woman who lives by her wits, and a hundred things true and untrue come up to confirm it. Hester Murray's pitcher had gone once too often to the well; it was broken for good and all now. And Levallion, who had once been her slave, had forbidden her to come within his gates.

"Well, he can do it," she thought defiantly, "but he can't make me obey him! I'll try one more window and then I'll go. I don't want to kill myself." And the sharp shiver that went through her made her move hastily through the darkness. It was odd, but the drip of the rain from the house made her think of earth falling into a grave. It was ghostly, terrifying to lurk outside in the dark, while women no better than she sat at their ease on the other side of a window-pane.

Stumbling, for all her slim grace; weary, for all the passion that burned in her, she made her way round the house in the pitchy darkness that had somehow got on her nerves. There was a little alcove in the drawing-room, whose modern French window reached the floor—it was odd how well Mrs. Murray knew the house—it would do no harm to glance in there, if the blind-was up. They would be coming out from dinner soon; and she might as well see all she could before going back to that lonely house where no one ever came. And once more that pang at her heart sickened her. All this might have been hers once, and had been thrown away.

There was no standing on tiptoe to reach the second window. Before she neared it she saw the square of light it flung on the grass, saw the convenient rose-bush which would shield her from any one inside. And if there had been land of the other was wet to the skin, her thin house-dress a sticky, sopping mass.

"Look here, Hester!" he said almost kindly.

"Better give up this business and go home. You wen't mend matters by being seen hanging about wen't mend matters by being seen hanging abo any one to see the fierce white face, so changed from that of the Hester Murray who had been all smiles and softness, they might have shrunk away as if they saw an evil spirit.

"Ah!" she drew in her breath sharply, for she had builded better than she knew.

Dinner was over; the men were coming into the drawing-room; one, with his arm in a sling, coming straight to this alcove, unconscious, though Hester did not know it, that it already held his hostess looking for a book for which the duchess had asked her. He had sat down wearily before he saw the gleam of orange and ivory the watcher outside had seen long ago, as she saw Lady Levallion drop the just-found book and turn to him quickly, breathlessly.

Yet her words might have been shouted on the housetops; there was no need for Mrs. Murray to strain her ears to catch those compromising utterances through the glass.

"Won't you go to bed? You look so tired!" He nodded. He could hardly bear to look at her whom once he had never wanted out of his sight.

"I'll go directly. I meant to go away tomorrow, but the doctor won't let me travel till the end of the week." His eyes on her wistfully, saying what his lips dared not—that it was not his fault that he was making things so hard for her.

"He's quite right," she answered, for the benefit of the went with the current the current to the current the current to the current that the current the current that the current that the current the current that the current that the current that the current that the current the current that the ing what his lips dared not—that it was not his fault that he was making things so hard for her.

"He's quite right," she answered, for the benefit of any one who might be outside the curtained recess. "We are very glad to have you," but the hard-held look of her face told Gordon what he knew—that the words were a mockery. Mrs. Murray remembered suddenly that she had not seen Levallion come into the room. An unreasoning and instinctive terror caught her heart, and sent her noiselessly, invisibly in her dark dress, yards away from the lighted window. And just in time.

Levallion, sauntering with apparent almlessness, an Inverness cape thrown over his shoulder, an unlit cigarette in his mouth, came round the corner of the house. Lord Chayter's recital of the half-seen face at the window having set him wondering if it were real or not. But he had seen no one, and in front of the window he stopped and lit his cigarette, deciding Chayter had looked upon more champagne than was good for him.

His unseen neighbor slipped behind him, paused for one second to look under his upraised arm before she took to her heels. And both of them saw the same sight. A girl turning from a man with a curious, pitiful gesture, stopped half-way; and the man, left alone, covering his haggard eyes with his hand. Levallion turned like a flash and had Hester Murray by the elbow.

CHAPTER XX.

A WICKED WOMAN'S TONGUE.

"I heard you breathing," Levallion said composedly. "No, don't you struggle; I'll let you go! Only be kind enough to tell me what earthly pleasure it gives you to look in my windows."

earthly pleasure it gives you to look in my windows."

"No pleasure," said Hester Murray after a minute, when her frightened heart had seemed to choke her, and the quick withdrawal of his contemptuous grasp to make her a thing of no moment. "Only misery. Oh, Levallion! Won't you be less hard on me? If you let me come here and be friendly with your wife it would set things right again. It kills me to be alone without a friend in the world."

set things right again. It kills me to be alone without a friend in the world."

"What things? What do you mean?" sharply. She dared not tell him. He would never help her if he knew.

"Nothing much." she said, shivering, only halfartificially. "I've lost all my money, and—and people seem to have dropped me! To stay in your house with the duchess might help me."

"Has she dropped you, too?" he inquired, wondering if, after all his careful analysis, she was not such a fool as she seemed.

"I don't know." I haven't seen her lately," though she knew well enough.

Levallion's hawk eyes narrowed as he peered at her in the rainy darkness. Her wet hair strayed in lank locks down her face, that for once was not smiling. (How he had grown to loathe Hester's smile!) He put up a suspicious hand on her thin shoulder and recoiled. She was wet to the skin, her thin house-dress a sticky, sopping mass.

"I ook here. Hester!" he said almost kindly.

sold me up for the principal and interest." Only desperate hope made her speak the truth. "I tell you, Levallion, I haven't a sou!"
"For an astute woman you haven't managed well," he said, after what seemed a long time. "If you had five hundred a year allowed you, quarterly, do you think you would be able to stay at home in the evenings?"

Five hundred a year to the woman who had had five times as many thousands spent on her! But she swallowed her rage, her contempt at his beggarly offer.

"I suppose—I could," she said slowly, "But—oh! it's not my poverty that hurts me, it's—"
"Do go home, I beg of you!" said Levallion, coldly. "You are not yourself. And, remember that you shall be supplied with what I consider an adequate income if you will leave this place and live elsewhere"—for, after all, he could not let the woman starve, dire and evil as had been her sins against him.

"I'll go—I'll do anything," she muttered, with a sudden exhaustion that made her clutch the dripping bushes beside her. "But listen to me first. In spite of everything, I care for you still. I'd do anything for you. I've no pride left. If you will come and see me sometimes, your marriage shall be as if it had never happened—"
"Have the goodness," interrupted Lord Levallion icily, "to leave my marriage out of the question. It concerns me, because it kills me to see you taken in deceived!" she cried fercrely, and so

"It concerns me, because it kills me to see you taken in, deceived!" she cried fiercely, and so quickly that he could not stop her. "You could have seen it for yourself, not ten minutes ago, if you had not been besotted about her. Ask your wife what she knows about Adrian Gordon, and why she did not marry him," utterly reckless now as to whether her lie about Adrian's wife were found out or not. "She was engaged were rich. It was better to marry you, and have wild, she seized his arm, "don't throw me over!

Think of the boy, think how I have no world

"Don't touch me," said Levallion, with a sudden acrid fury, as if he had waked from some bad dream in which he was bound and speechless. "Go!"

"Say that if you're ever miserable—unhappy—you'll come back to me!" She was pleading for her very life, as a fool does when death is certain. "Levallion!"

A curious stiffness came over the man from head to foot. When it broke he would have no power over tongue or hand; and this was a woman.

"Go away. Be quick!" he said hoarsely. "Because of what's past you shall have your money, but not if you stay in my village. Your lies—"

"They're truth" contemptuously. "Ask, ask, and you'll see. She was so close to him that he felt her breath en his face. "Then perhaps you'll come to me."

"If you were dying in the gutter I would not come to you," he spoke so evenly that she did not know that death stood closer to her than even Lord Levallion. "If you crawled after me on your knees, I would not change to you—or the boy! No matter what happened, neither you nor he shall ever get anything from me but the bread I would give to a beggar. Do you understand?" and in the dark she could not see his face. face

"Go!" said Levallion thickly, "before I kill you with my hands." But as he turned on her she had seen his eye.

She shrauk away and ran, madly, where she neither knew nor cared. She had gone too far with him! He would murder her out here in the dark. Her dry, shut throat could make no sound in the terror that would not let her scream. Trembling, stumbling, falling and getting up again, Hester Murray fled through the darkness and rain. Her gown, that had been a soaked whisp, was a mass of filthy mud, her hands were caked with the clay of the roads, but she ran still, round and round sometimes, but, by degrees, more in the right direction. It was not till her breath absolutely would not come to her aching lungs and the blood beat in her face, that she came to herself and realized where she was. Alone on a country road, nearly at her own house, with not a soul following her, not a sign of those devilish eyes that had gleamed murder at her through the dark.

Her wet hair down her back, her hands filthy, her black, ganzy gown an indescribable mass of mud and twigs and tatters, the blood purple in her pulsing face, she burst into her own drawing-room, where a lamp burned dimly, though there was no fire in the grate.

"Does he think I'm a fool? That I won't pay him out, if I have to break myself to do it? she cried fiercely, since her one maid went home at night, and there was no one to hear her.

"But—be the was wrong, for a man's voice answered her from the depths of a high-backed chair that was turned, away from her.

"But she was wrong, for a man's voice answered her from the depths of a high-backed chair that was turned, away from her.

"But what is the matter with you? Hester Murray, in her wet, unspeakable gown, sat down on one of her clean chintz chairs and told him. Whether the exact truth, or not, does not matter; but crimson-faced, glittering-eyed, she was a dreadful sight as the quick words came from her lips.

What he said, what she answered, she could not remember half an hour later, as she dragged her exhausted body up to bed, with a curiously compounded drink in a tumbler, which was to counteract the effects of exposure and fright. She fell asleep as soon as she felt the comfort of her warm bed, only muttering now and again as sleep gained on her.

"Til do it. He brought it on himself. It was—his fault. I hate him. I hate him!" and the fury of the thought wakened her for one burning, choking instant till her queer potion took hold of her, and she fell fast asleep, as they say men have done in the rack.

WHITE POPPIES OF OBLIVION.

Levallion, left alone on the wet grass, had never made one step after her.

Alone, in the night and the rain, he had fought down that dreadful passion, that lonthing that had made him forget everything but the desire to be rid of a venomous thing. He fought down, too, a harder thing; that shame that comes after the breaking out of a devil's temper, whose leash has given way under the strain; and at last could turn and go into his house, join his party, as if nothing had happened.

"Well! Did you discover any one?" Lord Chayter inquired covertly.

Levallion looked at him.

"There was no one there," he said calmly, not knowing that to have told the truth would have been to put a bar in the way his young wife must travel. He could not tell Chayter what was none of his business, and might work round through the women to Ravenel.

His eyes passed his friend and found his wife.

"By ___!" said the man's mind heavily. "If ever I saw innocence, there it sits. What do I care if she was engaged to Adrian twenty times over, she did not marry me to be Lady Levallion! She married me because she was wretched, and if I would have listened to her, she would have told me, the whole story. Ask Sylvia!" he smiled as he alone could smile when his heart ached. "I would as soon ask the devil for holy water! And if Tommy did not punch my head for impertinence if I asked him—gad! I'd kick him. I'm not in my dotage that I believe the statements of an angry, hysterical woman."

But, in spite of himself, Levallion saw every action of Ravenel's through a magnifying-glass all the next day. It rained, and there was no shooting to speak of; the men were at home by luncheon-time, and up to that Lady Levallion had been with them, chaperoning Mrs. Damerel, sick and against her will, since to kill birds for pleasure was to fler a crime. And all that afternoon she never spoke to Adrian Gordon, nor he to her. They might have been utter strangers with a preconceived dislike to one another. But Adrian looked Adrian looked like a haunted man, who deliberately turns his eyes from the sight he dare not see.

"Levallion," said a charming voice in his ear at tea-time, "I've an idea!"

It was Mrs. Damerel, who had for years cherished a platonic—and unreturned—affection for her handsome, sharp-tongued host.

Levallion repressed the obvious retort.

"Tell it," he drawled; "I never have any!"

"Let-us have a fancy ball tonight—oh! I know there are only twenty of us, but it's enough.
The men can wear evening dress," shrewdly, "but the women must all dress in their favorite flower, and wear masks. We're nearly all the same height, and it would be so amusing. Fancy," with a delighted laugh, "if you were to take me for your wife!"

"You never gave me a chance! You refused to poison Damerel," calmly. "Every woman her favorite flower—delicious! But what a revelation of character! What's yours? The flower of silence?"

A Few Cleaning Ideas

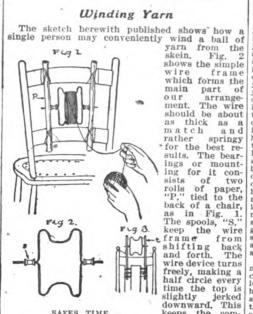

The cleaning block marked Fig. 1 is patterned after the sandpaper block used by carpenters. On the top surface are two grooves running crosswise. When the cloth is wrapped around the block it is pressed into the grooves and held there by the small strips, which also bed into the grooves. This is made clear by Fig. 2 and by the sketches "A" and "B." The cloth can to a point to enable the worker more easily to clean corners with it. Following this is an idea for holding broom cloths on. It consists of tying the running strings to one or two hooks driven into the broom handle. The last sketch shows a wire hook fastened to the wall at a convenient point for holding open a refrigerator door. When not in use, it hangs down against the wall.

as thick as a n drather springy for the best results. The bearings or mounting for it consists of two rolls of paper, "P." tied to the back of a chair, as in Fig. 1. The spools, "S," keep the wire frame from shifting back and forth. The wire device turns freely, making a half circle every time the top is slightly jerked downward. This keeps the com-saves time, keeps the coming-off strand always at the top. Fig. 3 shows practically the same plan, only the paper rolls are fixed so that the wire is entirely above the chair. I have no hesitancy in recommending the device to ladies who do knitting. It is my own invention and I have used it with much success.

Porch Gate for Baby

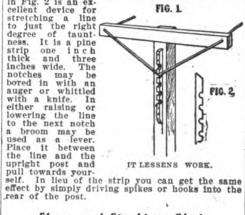

This gate is designed chiefly with the intention of making something extra strong and lasting that would not mar or scratch the porch pillars. The main part of the gate is made of an upper and lower rail filled in with spindles. The diagonal brace makes a strong and rigid frame. Fig. 2 shows the detail of joining those parts. Instead of a hinge we use a straight piece of gas pipe for a pivot. The gate swings and the pipe is fixed. In Fig. 3 we see that part of the pipe that is under the porch. "B" is a bed of concrete to hold the iron rigid; "A" is a coupling just under the porch floor. In Fig. 5, "F" is a flange that is screwed to the floor, "S" is a sleeve or loose fitting piece of pipe that supports the gate, "P" is the three quarter inch pipe coming through the hole. In Fig. 6, "W" is a small flange screwed to the under side of the lower gate rail. It keeps the pipe sleeve from cutting into the wood. Fig. 4 is a view of the top side of the upper rail and the upper part of the pipe pivot. "G" is a flange and "E" a cap. The gate is fastened by tying to the pillar. It can be taken down any time and the only mar the porch will show is one round hole where the pipe came through. This can be neatly plugged.

My Dear Mrs. Wilkinson and Sisters:

I have enjoyed the sisters' letters for many years but never thought myself competent to write a letter until I read Mrs. V. M.'s letter. I can't see wherein she needs any sympathy at all. My dear sister, I think you are richly blessed to have such a good husband, one that is good to you and provides well for you. Even if you don't love him you certainly ought to appreciate him for I think you were lucky to get such a good man. If you could only realize the prize EDEN, MISS.

you have won! I think you let your imagination run away with you when you think of meeting the man you would love. It would be folly to leave a kind husband for a dream, for there are few dreams that come true. Even if you ever meet the man you love, my advice is to stay with your husband for I don't think anything good could come to you by doing otherwise. Did you ever stop to think that it was the Evil One who is putting such things into your head? Don't you know that he would be giad to bring misery and discontent into your good home? Try and live a Christian life and work for the Master and I don't think you will think so much of your husband's faults, for who is there that has no faults? Let the love of God come into your heart and you will be happy.

This is my first attempt at writing to this corner but I have always wanted to. I have just been reading the last issues of Comfort and they were fine, as usual. We had quite cold weather here a year ago this winter. I was in Haines City, Florida, so you see there was considerable difference in the climate. Florida is a fine place in the winter months but it gets extremely hot there in the summer. The orange and grapefruit groves were most interesting to line. The trees were full of ripe fruit when we went there (CONTINUED ON PAGE 16.)

Black or dark brown furs, if they are the natural color of the animal and not dyed, can be freshened by rubbing them with a rag dipped in alcohol.

This year, any quantity of lace is used on all really "dressy" costumes, in the form of collars, guimpes, sleeve ruffles, vests, jacket fronts, etc. The idea is a very pretty one if—and there is a great big "if" in the case—these laces are clean and fresh, for dirty lace is never anything else but revolting. It is possible to dry-clean else but revolting. It is possible to dry-clean ruffles and vests that are attached by only one side to the frock, or any sort of lace or net trimming that is not superimposed on the cloth or silk by laying the dress on a table and pulling out the ruffles or vest or whatever it is, putting white paper under this and sifting borax thickly over it. Then place another piece of paper on the top and put on a weight—an old flat-iron will do. Leave it for several hours. But be very careful in doing this that the borax does not touch the material of the frock, or it will fade it.

does not touch the material of the frock, or it will fade it.

Old laces that, are very much soiled can be made to look like new by steeping. Make a rather strong suds of white or naptha soap and warm water. Pour this into an old preserve jar and put the lace in. Place it in a saucepan of boiling water and let it boil slowly for an hour. When the lace is taken from the jar it should not be rubbed, but simply rinsed in cool water and then pinned out to dry. Real lace should never be ironed, as this always flattens the threads and takes away the new look. Squeeze, out the water carefully with the hands and lay the lace face down on a board. An ironing board can be used for this purpose if you cover one end with a clean piece of old muslin, stretched very tight over it and pinned on the wrong side of the board. Now pin each point of the lace through to the board, taking care, in the case of collars or vests, that the proper shape is preserved, because as the lace is pinned so will it be when it is dry. The lace should be stretched just a little bit, but be careful not to strain it. If put in properly, the pins do not leave any mark and the lace will look as it did when it came from the shop. When quite dry, gently pull the points into shape.

before a particularly stubborn spot can be eradicated. When all the grease has disappeared, cover with blotting paper and press with a warm cated. When all the grease has disappeared, cover with blojting paper and press with a warm iron.

Silks should be cleaned with gasoline or naphtha, but be careful not to use it near a light or a fire, or it will explode.

Ink stains can be removed with milk. If possible, dip the spotted portion of the dress in a small saucer of milk and place it in a warm room. By the time the milk has soured the stain will have disappeared. The action is quicker with sour milk than with sweet, because it is the lactic acid contained in the milk that, removes the spot. The milk can then be removed like any other grease spot.

Never throw away old corsets until you are quite sure you cannot use them again. Many a pair has been given a new lease of life by careful washing and mending. Lay the corsets out on the kitchen table or any other smooth surface that will not be injured by water and then dip a nail brush or any small firm brush in hot water, rub it on a cake of naphtha soap and then scrub all over the corsets, paying particular attention to all spots and brown streaks. Rinse well and if not clean, scrub again. Dry quickly in the sun or before a fire to prevent the steels from rusting. Now go over the corsets carefully, mending every place that needs it and putting a small piece of muslin under any spots where the material seems very much worn. Corsets will shrink a little when washed in this way, but they will soon pull into shape again after they have been worn but a very short time.

Little Charms for the Home

T is surprising what a difference pretty candle shades make to the appearance of the dinner table. Candles are undoubtedly most becoming, and a very charming effect is produced if the candle lights are the only lights in the room.

Color has far more influence upon our feelings and tempers than we ever realize. Often have we felt a strange depression when we entered a room, while then again, another room will inspire one with cheerfulness and brightness. It is all a question of color, and color is an important point to be considered when you are choosing your candle shades.

Avoid blues, greens and mauves, as they shed a wierd and sickly light. Pink, orange and red are good, and a pale lemon may also be used, but a medium shade of yellow with a brown tone in it, is to be avoided.

When your table is adorned with red, pink or yellow flowers, match them in silk or paper for your candle shades of pale pink; and pale yellow shades for blue flowers. It is quite easy to make these candle shades, and far cheaper than buyil, them ready made.

For a foundation, use little wire frames, and always use an asbestos frame underneath. With regard to material, for economy's sake, paper can be used and very excellent results can be obtained; or one can often pick up cheap remnants of chiffon or silk that make charming shades.

A very attractive shade can be produced by purchasing a very attractive shade can be produced by purchasing a very attractive shade can be produced by purchasing a very attractive shade can be produced by purchasing a very attractive shade can be produced by purchasing a very attractive shade can be produced by purchasing a very attractive shade can be produced by purchasing a very attractive shade can be produced by purchasing a very attractive shade can be produced by purchasing a very attractive shade can be produced by purchasing a very attractive shade can be produced by purchasing a very attractive shade can be produced by purchasing a very attractive shade.

An attractive treatment for the dining-room may be had by the use of a good quality of cretonne in Colonial design, showing roses in deep dull reds and soft greens. It will add a note of cheerfulness and brightness to any dining-room in which it is used. If double doors separate this room from another, portieres of plain old-rose homespun will finish the room most charmingly.

A beautiful effect can be created in a Colonial living-room by using one of the new English chintz patterns of cretonne which are printed on a black ground. Secure a pattern showing a delightful combination of flowers and birds in typical chintz colorings, and the dull black background by contrast makes it doubly charming.

The making of new furnishings in crochet and linen for the home means just so many additions to the housewife's store of durable things, since the materials will wear for years and yet preserve their beauty.

Modern reproductions of antique crochet in bird, animal and floral crochet patterns are among the special favorites for chair-back pieces, tray covers and cushion tops, while conventional running patterns for insertions and edgings are combined with linen for bed and couch-covers, table-covers, scarfs and cushions. Coverlets and tidies of a century ago are rich in quaint and beautiful designs for adaptation.

Cushion designs in all crochet are made more striking in effect when lined with silk or satin in a contrasting color. Linen thread or carpet warp should be used for a living-room cushion, with a lining of green or gold, and white thread for a bedroom nap pillow, over blue, pink or yellow.

"Why send our young men to fight the battles of France and England in Europe? Why not keep our army at home to devend America when the Germans come over here to attack us? These are questions that we frequently hear. The answers are simple and convincing.

First. We are not fighting the battles of France and England. For three and a half years they have been fighting our battles as much as their own. That world-conquest is the aim of Germany and that the Kaiser's plan from the first has been to attack America as soon as he's done with Europe, is proven beyond a doubt by his declarations quoted in recent bulletins issued by our Government without the help or sympathy of the Allies, as should have to fight Germany after this war is over, and make the fight all by ourselves without the help or sympathy of any other nation on earth.

Third. What suicidal idiocy it would be to have our homes ravaged with fire and sword by choosing America instead of Europe as the battle ground of our war with Germany!

Some idea, of what French and Belgian homes have suffered from the fiendish cruelty of the German invaders can be had from the following statement of a reliable eye-witness.

A prominent New York minister, who has spent some months on the battle-fronts of Europe, speaking from his pulpit recently said: "The traveler of whatsoever country who has lingered for two or three months in Belgium or France has gone away a permanently saddened man. German efficiency has chiefly manifested itself in the last three years in the discovery of the science of torturing your brothers and sisters and mine. The mere catalogue of the things my eyes have seen would take weeks. I have seen a tract of devasted territory as large as Long Island where the German selfel behind not one single house, no

They asked for the young men and there were none. My husband was much older than I was. They lined up fifteen of the old men and shot them. They took all the rest of them, led them out into a large field and shot them too.' And the Prefect said, 'and your boy?' She replied: They found him in the garret. They took him down the road and I found him later hanging to a pear tree. I cut him down, took out his blackened tongue to ease his labored breath, and sprinkled his face with water. Back the Germans came, and while a lieutenant held my arms, another soldier poured oil on my boy's head and clothes. They set fire to him and while he staggered about, a flaming torch, they shrieked with laughter. There is one thing I regret. I made him die twice.'

staggered about, a flaming torch, they shrick with laughter. There is one thing I regret. I made him die twice.'

"There was a little town of 275 people to which the Germans came in their retreat.

"In a little stone house a story and a half high, lived a young woman whose husband was at the front, and her baby. Her two sisters also tried to find a place of safety there.

band was at the front, and her baby. Her two sisters also tried to find a place of safety there. The Germans ordered them out.

Twelve men were told off in squads of four. Each squad was directed to shoot one of the sisters. They shot the girl of sixteen, they shot the girl of seventeen and they shot the third. They had no guns, these women and children—nothing to defend themselves with.

What if I should speak to you of the girl of fourteen who was nailed to the outside door of a cottage by her hands. What if I tell you of the hundreds and hundreds of young girls and women with mutilated breasts, and for this reason: Every German soldier is examined for syphilis by the surgeon of the regiment and only the healthy ones receive a card giving access to the camp women. If a syphilitic German contaminates a camp woman this disease is handed on to his brother and that means he will be shot. This syphilitic soldier therefore finds his only chance with the captured French girls, but having contaminated the girl he fears

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a girl twelve years old. I have no sisters or no brothers. I have brown hair and brown eyes. I am going to school and am in the sixth grade. Teacher's name is Miss Olive Arbuckle. We gave an entertainment and pie supper and had'a fine time. I was in two dialogues, pantomine, and ten songs. After the program an auctioneer sold the pies. They sold for $43.41. Uncle Charlie you should have been here to attend our pie supper. I know you would have enjoyed it. We have bought $13.21 worth of books, coal hod price $1.00, water bucket price $1.00 and a dipper price 25 cents. Our teacher is going to order a dictionary and a flag today. She is going to buy heavy wire and put over the windows so the tramps can't get into the schoolhouse. We are bothered with tramps considerably as our schoolhouse is so close to the railroad. I am janitor at school this year. My teacher says I can make such good fires, and that I always sweep and dust the schoolroom sonicely. There are 20 pupils in our school. There are nine boys and 11 girls. We have a very nice school. We have taken Comport for three years. With good wishes to all,

Thank you. Rosa, for your delightful letter.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

In reply to A. B.'s inquiry about California beer seeds, they are started from sorghum that is made when the cane is in such a stage that it causes the molasses to clabber. Dissolve the molasses and there will be a yellow sediment left in the dish. Put fresh, sweetened water on this sediment every two or three days, first drain off the stale water, and in a few days they will begin to grow. Then you have what is called California beer seed. It is used for a table beverage. beverage.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

In the November issue of COMFORT we read a letter from a "Soldier's Sweetheart," who said she thought it was a disgrace for a boy to be drafted into the army. We have brythers and sweethearts who were drafted but we don't think it a disgrace. They loved us so well that they would not leave us until they had to. And we do not call them cowards because they were drafted for we know they will serve their country as wells and fight as bravely as though they had enlisted. What do the sisters think about this?

Best wishes to all,

Dear Comfort Sisters:

I am a young girl of sixteen, but many people think I am older because they say I have such "womanly ways." Well, it is not much to wonder at if I have as I am housekeeper for my Dad. My Mother died when I was ten years old. How I miss her! Many, yes, thousands of times, I have cried myself sick in my loneliness for her. When she died she left a ten days' old baby boy. He is still living and has as good a home as can be found. He is treated like one of the family. God bless the dear people that take care of him. I have four brothers older than myself and four younger and a sister eleven years old. Three of my brothers registered but have not been drafted at this writing. How I wish the war would end! But I suppose when our country calls, the call must be heeded. I would be proud to see my brothers wearing Uncle Sam's uniform and even to have them give their lives for the country we all love, but it would mean a vacant place that could never be filled.

I have a ten-room house to care for and keep clean and at present I am taking care of my fourteen-year-old brother. He was accidentally shot in the foot by my older brother so I am playing &ed Cross Nurse now. Besides that I have the cooking to do and sometimes I am very tired but still I am proud of my position. We are poor people, my father is in debt and sometimes it is very hard to get along. Some of you will be shocked when I tell you that I have had a boy friend and that we have kept steady company for two years. He is twenty-one years old. We have promised to be true to each other, and we have been. My brothers all like him and know him to be a "right sort of fellow." I want to ask the sisters something: Am I doing right in keeping company with him when I am so young? I don't care a snap for other boys.

God bless you every one, dear sisters, and think of me once in a while.

Since my first letter appeared in Comfort I have been nearly swamped with letters from all over the United States, most of them asking for information in regard to homesteading in this part of the country—some were thoughtful enough to enclose stamps and I have been glad to favor them with what information I could give. Several others have written, apparently anxious for replies, but neglected to enclose postage, consequently I must answer them through the columns of this paper. *I hope they will not be offended, but homesteading is not very prosperous business the first year and I just can't afford it.

First, I wish to thank those who made suggestions as to breaking my twins of the dirt-eating habit and, I am glad to inform you that, as Mrs. Welsh of Kansas writes, "The habit just gradually were off," and I did not have occasion to try the remedies suggested.

and I did not have occasion to try the remedies suggested.

There is no more vacant land in this vicinity to be taken under the homestead law, as all parts of this valley were settled years ago. There are a great many homesteads taken up about thirty miles from here but I do not know whether there are any left or not. I cannot advise anyone with small means to try to make a living on a homestead. Unless you can clear, plow and fence your place, build your house and have enough to live on the first year, you'd better stay where you are until you can save enough to do so. I know whereof I speak for we are getting that experience right now and it is pretty hard scratching.

to do so, that experience right now and it is pretty nare scratching.

I want to inform all those who sent me the endless chain prayer, eight in all, that I have let it go unanswered and broken the chain to smithereens. I considered it a piece of foolishness. It might have been practiced in the days of the Salem witchcraft, when people were superstitious enough to do anything, but in these days when people are educated and know there is nothing to it,—why pester people with a piece of nonsense gotten up by some one years ago. If you want to pray for the welfare of our soldiers and sailors, don't send these mimic prayers through the mail but go at it in the right way.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have taken COMFORT many years and have enjoyed the Sisters' Corner very much.

Worried Mother, I have a little boy three years old that has acquired bad habits just as your little boy has. He learned his rude ways from some of the children with whom he played, and I cannot seem to break him of his saucy talk. He will strike at his father or me when we try to make him obey. I would like to have advice from the sisters, for punishing or talking does not do any good.

I have had two little boys but my baby was taken away when he was seven months old and oh, how I miss him. The outfit I made for my babies is as follows: Three shirts, three flannel petticoats, six bands (will send pattern for band to anyone wishing it and enclosing postage; it fits very nicely), twenty-four diapers, six everyday dresses, two blankets, 24x36 inches, and two muslin petticoats. I made all these myself. I think the sewing helps pass away the time. I use white material for everything for I think baby looks sweeter in white. As for the cap and coat, I did not make those until the baby came.

I am twenty-three years old, five feet, five and one half inches tall, have blue eyes and a fair skin. Have been married nearly five years to she of the best of Clydes.

HE screened end of the wide back porch was invitingly cool. The vines that clung to wire netting outside the screens made a protecting shade for the neatly set dinner table. The big kitchen, opening onto the porch, its bare floor scrubbed snowy white, was neat and orderly. The stove stood at one side, cold and neglected, though it was the dinner hour and already the men were coming in from the field. At breakfast time the fire had been allowed to go out, now the temperature of the entire house was cool despite the midsummer sun. The men, as they stepped onto the wide, unscreened end of the porch, called out a cheerful, "All ready," to the smiling woman who was busily removing smoking articles from a mysterious looking box.

As the little group seated itself to a well-prepared meal of hot roast and vegetables with ice cold milk fresh from the cellar, one of the group stared about him with interested eyes. The new help who had been hired that morning, had come from another farm in the same community. His last employer's wife had a reputation for good things to eat.

Mrs. Simpson, his present hostess, hesitatingly asked him if he liked some particular dish.

"Why, Mrs. Simpson, I would like anything when you serve it this way out here, cool and with no flies and no heat. How in the world did you happen to think of it, and how did you cook a meal without a fire in the stove? How did you do it all?"

Mrs. Simpson smiled and nodded at the young cook a meal without a fire in the stove? How did you do it all?"

Mrs. Simpson smiled and nodded at the young woman who sat at her left.

"When she came here seven years ago to teach the rural school, we were all pretty ignorant, but we knew we wanted to learn. One day I asked her advice about some questions not taught in schools. I asked her how to make the children satisfied so they would not want to go away. I asked her how to make them all happier, and this is what she told me:

"'Make your home more comfortable and happy. Have a bright sitting-room for them, even though there may be two beds in the room. Give them what they will like to eat, even though it may be the same old articles of food prepared in a different way. Make a home for them if you would give them a right vision of living.'"

To Mrs. Simpson these words had meant alrepared in a different way. Make a home for them if you would give them a right vision of living.'"

To Mrs. Simpson these words had meant almost nothing. How was she to know how an attractive sitting-room looked; how was she to know how an attractive sitting-room looked; how was she to know how an attractive sitting-room looked; how was she to know how an attractive sitting-room looked; how was she to know how an seed that these things were possible, but how was she to know?

When, several years later, this same young school teacher, Mrs. Myra Tandy, was made secretary of the Middlee Tennessee Home Makers' Association, she saw the necessity of more than advice to improve home conditions in the country. The rural world is filled with women who are seger to learn, but, like Mrs. Simpson, they do not know the very opening sentence in this book of home science. The Home Makers' Association is not only telling the farm women in Tennessee that perfectly baked bread will keep the family better satisfied, but it is showing the most simple and scientific methods of baking.

The majority of the wives of prosperous farmers are excellent housekeepers by inheritance and by training; but the other percent have homes and families too. The woman who has the knowledge and efficiency to make home comfortable frequently lacks the opportunity to put her knowledge into execution. When she must walk a quarter of a mile down a steep hill to the spring for every bucket of water, she does not feel encouraged to use it very frequently in scrubbing. When she must go out in bad weather for every plece of wood she burns, she is not tempted to cook those articles of food that require long baking, but substitutes the easier method of frying over a quick fire.

I chanced one day on a boy down South, who was working industriously in a half-acre tobacco patch.

If he explained, "because I ain't got but a half of a hoe."

The same plucky spirit is being shown by the farmer's wife. The farmer considers it a good almost say. A fireless cooker, a washing machine, a bread mixer, a cream separator, a vacuum cleaner, a kitchen cabinet,—every article that saved time, steps and labor were purchased and put to use. Some of the articles were ordered through agents, some through the teacher' sent out by the Home Makers' Association, but all were practical and easily obtained. In one year she had repaid her debt to the bank and had the household conveniences in perfect condition, and as there was no more need of a servant, she had that amount of money to spend in any manner she chose—on clothes or on an occasional trip.

It cannot be estimated in dollars and cents what has been saved the bread-winner of the family by the little food-chopper that clamps to the kitchen table. The kitchen cabinet that holds a miniature grocery store, protects the foods from dust, mice and germs, but this is one of the least of its advantages. By concentrating all the most used articles in one spot, miles of walking are saved the housewife. Each step saved means just that much energy stored up.

By using a fireless cooker, the mother and housewife can prepare her Sunday dinner and place it in the cooker before church hour. In place of remaining in the kitchen to labor all Sunday morning to have dinner ready when the rest of the family return from church, she, too, enjoys the service and comes home to a well-cooked dinner.

"This is a business proposition," explained Mrs. Stratton, president of the organization,—a farmer's wife. "We farmers' wives are as justified in buying implements to save labor in the house as our husbands are in buying modern implements to use on the farm. The treasury is never too low to buy the sulky plow that's needed; why should it be for the washing machine or the fireless cooker?"

When one particular community suffered a siege of typhoid, one woman, who had become familiar with the rules of sanitation and home hygiene through hearing talks given by the Home Makers are trying to do and are really doing. "But," said Mrs. Tay almost say. A fireless cooker, a washing machine a bread mixer, a cream separator, a vacuum done in the home is in keeping the young people satisfied. Ask any farmer's wife if she wants her daughter to marry a farmer. Of course she will say 'No!''

There are two reasons why the women on the farm do not want their daughters subjected to a similar life. These are the unfair apportionment of the family income and the lack of modern conveniences. These two difficulties the Home Makers are trying to remedy.

Because the young people have no means of earning money of their own on the farm, they move to the city. By doing less work with shorter hours in factories or department stores, a definite amount of money can be made each week. What have they, they think, on the farm—board, clothes and a job they can't lose.

If the workman is worthy of his tools, so the woman who does, or is to do, her share of the work is worthy of remuneration. By simplifying home duties the women are allowed more time to themselves for congenial occupations or money-earning activities. If she has time to plant and cultivate violets, she can get a ready sale for them. So with mushrooms. If chickens are raised by scientific methods, they will bring much greater returns.

The girl who moves to the city to earn money does not realize that after board and necessities are met she does not have as much as could be made at home off one hundred fowl. The Home Makers' Association is telling the young girls of the country just how to raise chickens by the latest methods. The Home Makers are also working in co-operation with the Department of Agriculture in promoting an interest in the Girls' Tomato Club.

The Home Makers' Club was organized several years ago, in direct affiliation with the Farmers' Institute, for the purpose of giving to the women on the farm the same opportunities their husbands have so long enjoyed in coming together each year. The railroads have been very liberal in making rates that have enabled a great many country women to come to the state fair in the early fall when farm activities are dull. There for three days they

"I have to work lots longer than other folks," he explained, "because I ain't got but a half of a hoe."

The same plucky spirit is being shown by the farmer's wife. The farmer considers it a good business proposition to buy a wheat binder on the installment plan, but would he consider a fireless cooker bought on the same terms a good investment, too? The farmer cannot harvest a crop of wheat without first of all putting his field in condition through systematic ploughing and sowing. He must have the proper implements, too to work with. And so the farmer's wife is waking to the need of better preparation and better implements for her work.

Only by organizing the women of each community into clubs with a regular plan of work mapped out, can real results be accomplished. This is what the Home Makers' Association did first of all. Because the women have recognized a need of better training for home work on the farm, the Home Makers' Association is sending out trained workers to lecture on home economics and tell the women in the country of the new labor-saving devices.

One woman, who had always kept one servant to help her and who, even with assistance, found the work overtaxing, discharged her help one desperate day and made a reckless plunge for freedom. She borrowed two hundred dollars from the bank at six percent, giving a mortgage on a tract of land, to which she held the deed, as security. She used every cent of the money in the house, every cent in the kitchen, I might

DEAR EDITOR:

I am much interested in cooking and when I have some good recipes I like to pass them on, so I enclose some that I have tested and found good. I hope you will find space for them in our Corner.

I enclose also a short poem, which you may like. I think the sentiment is very good. Surely we must try to do our best in whatever we do. I do not know the name of the author.

S Yours for success,

MINNIE O. MACKINTOSH.

Do Your Best

"Do your best and not be troubled Should some others better do, If your work should fail to please you, Don't give up, but strive anew."

"Do your best, for slighted labor Ne'er can satisfaction bring, Do it quickly, time is passing, You must seize it on the wing.

"Many duties lie before you,
Trials oft your strength shall test,
But you need not fret nor worry
If you only do your best."

Minnia Mackintosh.—Thanks for the recipes—I tried some of them and found them all that you said. I know the COMFORT sisters are good cooks, most of them, and sometimes wonder why they don't send more recipes.—Ed.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS :

Dear Comport Sisters:

Will you admit a lonely Missouri sister into your cheerful circle? I have been a subscriber to Comport for many years and have read and enjoyed it since the days of Aunt Minerva and her owls.

Mis. R. S. Shipe, your letter interested me very much and I am convinced there are many cases like yours, more the pity.

Brown Eyes, you are a sweet, brave little woman to win your husband away from his bad habits as you did and acted wisely and well. Many a woman in your place would have taken "father's" advice and left him, spoiling both your lives. Now your letter makes me feel that life is bright and happy to those who love and I believe it is the most glorious thing in the world. But my life has been pretty much of a failure because I refused the one I loved and would not listen to the pleadings of my heart but rushed blindly into marriage with another whom my parents favored and I thought if I were pleasing them I was doing my duty, regardless of my own feelings, but I find it was all a sad mistake and happiness is not always found in doing what you consider your duty. There is nothing, in my estimation, that causes more unhappiness than a mismated marriage. And now I want your advice, sisters. For ten years I have tried to be a helpful, cheerful wife, so far as circumstances would permit and though in very poor health most of the time, I have often got my own (CONTINUED ON PAGE 22.)

you, but you made me so angry, and you know I never could bear to be refused anything. Be good, now, and say you will help me; you would not like to see me driven from my present position, after holding it so many years," Ada said, striving to conciliate her companion, though such a fury of anger raged within her that she would have been glad to annihilate her on the spot could she have done so.

"No, Miss Ada, it has been a source of pride to me to know you were so well off, and I should grieve sorely should you have to lose all now. I will agree to help you in this thing until you marry and are settled in life; I will promise for nothing longer than that. Will that satisfy you?"

"I suppose it will have to, but having been brought up to expect everything, I am not going to lightly yield my claims at this late day."

"You are greedy, Miss Ada—as greedy as your poor father was, and, mark my words, you will yet over-reach yourself some fine day, and come to grief, as he did."

"Hold your tongue, Judith, and, once for all, it is decided that you will do as I want you to do?" Miss Therwin cried, almost beside herself with anger and impatience.

"I don't know whether it is or not," Madam Judith said, sullenly.

"Judith, you must—I will give you any amount that you have a mind to name, when once I can finger the gold in the Shirley coffers," she pleaded.

"You seem to have some doubt about the matter it seems." Judith replied with a leer adding

"Judith, you must—I will give you any amount that you have a mind to name, when once I can finger the gold in the Shirley coffers," she pleaded.

"You seem to have some doubt about the matter, it seems," Judith replied, with a leer, adding, as if she enjoyed tormenting for the moment her companion; "and taking all things into consideration your chance does look mighty slim." "I was a fool to put any confidence in you, Jude; but I've done it now, and it can't be helped—only I have not quite committed myself beyond redemption yet, seeing I have not told you who the parties are. I would be willing to promise you five thousand pounds, though, if you would carry my plans out as I want you to." "Well, well, Miss Ada, I don't pretend to any great amount of goodness, as you very well know, and I'm as glad to earn a handsome sum as any one I ever saw, only you've made me mad by throwing out so many slurs regarding the past, and I felt like kind of paying you back. I'll do your dirty work this time, if you'll agree to pay me well, but what's going to support me meantime?"

"Oh, I will take care that you have everything to make you comfortable; and now I want this thing accomplished just as soon as possible. You can take this, find yourself some comfortable rooms, and furnish them well, but not showily, and prepare yourself for the campaign before you. Just as soon as you are ready let me know," concluded Miss Therwin, handing her at the same time a folded bill.

Judith took it, deliberately unfolded it, and seemed satisfied with the result, for she said, more brightly than she had yet spoken:

"Well, I think you may expect to hear from me in the course of three or four days, at the farthest."

"All right, but be very cautious about making acqualintances or letting any one know aught of your business or past life."

"Wery well; but there is one other thing I wish you to speak about. I want you to dress in black, wear nice-looking though common caps, and lace kerchief; in fact, make yourself look just as attractive on very able," Miss Therwin replied, with a light in her eye which made her companion regard her in wonder.

"Good gracious, Miss Ada!" she said, "you look just as if there was a volcano inside of you, just ready to burst out at your eyes."

"Look out, then, that you don't arouse its slumbering fires," Ada said, striving to speak lightly, yet really feeling as if the woman's comparison was not inapt.

"You will remember that henceforth your name is Sylvia Henrietta Stillman," Miss Therwin remarked, with a peculiar look and emphasis.

"Oh, yes, I shall not forget, since it is nothing new for me to change my name, you know," Judith returned, with a bitter laugh, while a bright spot settled upon either cheek. "I suppose," she added, a moment after, "that you will allow me to prefix the Mrs. before it for propriety's sake?"

"Certainly, it will be advisable for you to do so, at least, until you are ready to make your revelations and claim your long-lost comfort," responded Miss Therwin, coolly, and she saw her guest depart with a feeling of infinite relief and satisfaction.

"That thing is settled," she said. "Judith will not go back on her word, and there is no reason now why my plans should not succeed, if I can only make them believe it all. I must write to her ladyship, the Countess of Shirley, tonight, and if she is only as obliging as I have reason to hope she will be, all will go well.

CHAPTER XII.

HOLDING THE FORT.

Count Egbert Shirley, of Shirley Court, Lancaster, England, was a peer, descended from an old, illustrious and very wealthy family.

His country-seat was in Lancashire County, where he spent most of his time when Parliament was not in session, while at that time he was, of course, in London.

Very beautiful was the Countess Hortense, and a very queen in the brilliant circles in which she moved, both before and after her marriage.

Four lovely children had been born to them, every one of whom they had been deprived of, and at last, in their loneliness, they had adopted Ada Therwin, the only child of a distant relative of the countess.

The child was bright and promising and the of the countess.

The child was bright and promising, and the Lady Hortense, whose childless heart yearned for the motherless girl, resolved to take and care for her as her own, thinking thus to brighten in some degree her own desolate home.

She was proud of the girl's cleverness, her beauty and accomplishments, as she grew toward womanhood, but bitterly disappointed in the disposition which she manifested. She was cold and selfish beyond description; seeking only her pleasure and amusement, without a spark of gratitude for all the kind care which she had received for so many years.

She never displayed an atom of love for either the countess or her husband, and often exhibited impatience and irritability under their caresses which annoyed and distressed them beyond measure.

As Ada grew older, however, she began to measure.

As Ada grew older, however, she began to realize more the necessity of yielding her will, and appearing to appreciate the care bestowed on her, if she cared to retain through life the position which they had given her as a child—that of a daughter. She began to realize what the daughter of Count Shirley would inherit—what vast possessions would be hers, as there was no one to whom they would descend by right—and gradually a change came over her. She was rather more submissive and gentle outwardly, though at heart she grew, if possible, more cold and selfish than ever.

F. I. M.—Here is an exercise for the arms that will help to develop them:

To Develop the Arms

Stand erect, heels together, chest out, chin up. Raise the arms on a level with the shoulders, stretched out perfectly straight toward the sides. Close the fingers of each hand tight. Now open them quickly and reach with the fingers wide apart as if trying to grasp something beyond reach. Repeat many times. You will feel this in the forearm as well as in the fingers, and it will develop the arm muscles.

MAMIE.—Last month I gave a talk for the girls of fourteen or so, about doing their hair, so that is normal.

G. R. L.—Yes my dear, you are below weight. For your height, five feet, five inches, you ought to weigh about one hundred and thirty at your age, and could weigh one hundred and forty when older, so get to work and gain those necessary pounds. I have given lots of advice in the recent issues of COMFORT about gaining weight and I presume you have read and are following them. That's what you should be doing. I can't tell how long it will take to kill the hair on your lip by the peroxide and ammonia, but since you say it has already lightened in color until it can scarcely be seen, I should say you are getting good results and before long the hair will fall out.

A good exercise to develop the calves of the logs.

"And you, my good fellow," said the lady visitor at the convict prison to No. 48, "what are you here for?"
"They said I stole a piano, mum:"
"And did you?"
"Well, mum," said No. 48, thinking that the benevolent woman might exercise some influence on his behalf if he told her the truth, "to be quite honest. I did. But there were extravagating circumstances. I was hungry. I did it in a moment of weakness, mum, and—"
"Weakness!" gasped the vistor. "My goodness! What would you have stolen in a moment of strength?"—Pittsburg Chronicle-Telegraph. A good exercise to develop the calves of the legs is this:

To Develop the Legs.

Standing with heels together, rise on the tips of the toes, keeping the back straight. Now, without bending the back, sink into a squatting position, keeping the heels off the floor. Rise to a standing position again without touching the hands to the floor; they should be on the hips. Practice this for ten or fifteen times twice a day and the calves of your legs will soon show results. What do you do in the way of outdoor exercise? Tennis, rowing, walking, swimping, or what? IME has brought us into another season, and despite the worry and thought of war and food conservation, we must take heed that we and ours require new clothes.

We may find relief in the thought that prevailing fashions are following the lines of the past season, with of course some pleasing changes and new features.

It is well that the coming season is one for which cotton goods, silks and materials of light weight are desirable, for wool fabrics are very scarce and expensive.

It is advisable in choosing a dress for early spring to try to combine silk or satin with wool, or omit the wool entirely.

Tunic draperies, blouses and waists with vests, lend themselves nicely to alterations and remedeling of garments that will admit of combining silk and wool, or satin and cloth.

You will find coats shorter this season, excepting those for motoring and general utility wear.

Supply of Seed Corn Short

The late spring, the cold, wet summer and the early frosts destroyed the supply of seed corn throughout the corn-growing states of the Upper Mississippi Valley, where the bulk of the corn is grown. In many of these states there is not a quarter enough ripe corn for seed. Every farmer in this section will need to do one or both of two things: Test his own seed corn to be sure whether it will grow or not, and if his own will not grow he must purchase seed that will, and the only way to make sure is to test the seed he proposes to purchase. Don't plant untested seed.

Testing Seed Corn

Never before was testing seed corn so important as this year. Ripe corn that looks good may not grow. In many cases not a single kernel taken from ripe and well-cared-for ears has sprouted. The early freeze, followed by warm, damp weather, was very favorable to the growth of molds, which have completely destroyed the vitality of the corn. No farmer should plant a single acre of corn this year without first giving the seed a thorough test. No one can tell by the looks of an ear whether it will grow or not. The only way is to test it. only way is to test it.

The best way is to test each individual ear. This is a slow process, but it can be done by taking a few kernels from each ear and keeping tilem separate from each other, marking each ear and each set of kernels with the same number. This necessitates a test box, made as described in Modern Farmer last year, but such a test is worth both the bother and the expense.

Sugar Beets—A Profitable Crop

MERICAN farmers have given farless attention to sugar beet culture, than have those across the water. Sourcess—sugar cane grown in warm climates, and sugar beets, which the war started, Central Europe was the water country of the war started, Central Europe was the water started, Central Europe was the ware started, Central Europe was the Pins supply has been entirely cut off and the European industry seriously crippled. It is to the destruction of the beet sugar industry that the destruction of the destructi

Tankage for Hogs

Many have asked in what proportion tankage should be fed to hogs along with corn, and to these it may be said that experiments, notably those made at the Ohio station, showed that when the ration contained as much as ten per cent, of tankage, there was no marked advantage in feeding a larger proportion of tankage in the early than in the later part of the test. When as low as five per cent of the ration consisted of tankage, it was advisable to feed a larger proportion during the early part of the experiment. For dry-lot feeding of pigs three to eight months old, an average of one part of tankage to from nine to 13 parts of corn ordinarily produced greater gains with a lower feed requirement per unit of gain than rations containing larger or smaller percentages of tankage. Skim milk when fed in combination with corn, according to Bulletin 316 of the Ohio Station, has a much higher feeding value than when fed alone. There is strong evidence to indicate that as a supplement to corn, skim milk has a distinct advantage over tankage, particularly for young pigs.

Tankage is best fed dry from a self-feeder and shelled corn is well fed in the same way. If tankage is mixed in slop, the mixture must be fed at once. Poisonous substances may develop in slop that is allowed to sour or ferment. The high price of tankage prevents its general use, but it is such a concentrated form of protein that it may usually be fed at a profit as a small part of the ration. It cannot cause contagious disease, all germs having been killed by exposure to great heat.

Community Organization to Meet the Labor Problem

This necessitates a test box, made as described in Modern Farmer last year, but such a test is worth both the bother and the expense.

A simpler Test

A much simpler test is made by taking a few kernels each from fifteen or twenty ears selected at random from the entire supply. These kernels are placed in moist sand, or sawdust that has been previously scalded with boiling water to kill the moids. This should be kept in a warm place for five or six days,—under the kitchen stove, or in some orther place where it will not get either too warm or too cold. The sand or sawdust must be yatched and not allowed to dry out.

If the number of kernels that refuse to grow exceeds 20 per cent., the corn is too low in vitality to be used for seed. By the use of this test, large batches of corn can be examined, and if it is impossible to get another supply, poor seed may be sorted over by the use of the ear steet, the bad ears rejected and the best ones saved may be sorted over by the use of the ear test, the bad ears rejected and the best ones saved may be sorted over by the use of the ear test, the bad ears rejected and the best ones and this practice should be extended to include spring work. Many a farmer whose boys or hired by the could possibly manage during the past was the proposed of the value of his seed corn by testing his seed of the value of his seed corn by testing his seed of the value of his seed to corn. That crop needs constant cultivation to keep weeds down and the surface soil loose and fine. To accomplish this, steady help is necessary, and that is going to be sorely lacking, therefore concentration of effort will lead farmers to seed greater attorn of effort will lead farmers to seed greater attorn of effort will lead farmers to seed greater attorn of effort will lead farmers to seed greater attorn of effort will lead farmers to seed greater attorn of effort will lead farmers to seed greater attorn of the feeding of man.

Let it not be thought, however that crop zero day to the first of the feeding of ma some barley and spring wheat, no doubt, will go in the same way; but it would be better to plow every field on old farms and where manure has been spread or where noxious weeds abound.

As teams and plowmen may not suffice for this work, and time will be short in which to get it done, it would be well to consider the practicability of community ownership, or leasing of large tractor plows. It pays men to invest in threshing outfits for neighborhood work, and we are wondering whether tractors might not be employed in the same way to do plowing and other farm work by the day, hour or job. These matters should be taken up with councils of defense, county agricultural agents, experiment stations, and implement dealers, and manufacturers, for we honestly believe that in many districts such outfits would this spring find plenty of work to do at profitable figures.

Meanwhile let us not selfishly believe that charity begins—and ends—at home, or that "every man for myself" is a good working policy in these times of stress and peril, but let every community of farmers work in unison for the good of all concerned. Such work requires leadership, and that should be arranged for at once at neighborhood meetings.

Beware Slovenly Work

Reware Sloventy Work

The temptation this year will be great to "smear over" the work in preparation of the soil for crops. Where the land was fall-plowed—and lucky is the man who got a considerable area of the farm plowed in fall before the boys went to war—a single disking may suffice, if the dragging then is done thoroughly. When it is impossible to plow the corn stubbles, however, and the land is heavy and weeds so thick that disking is necessary, a single disking rarely gives a sufficiently fine "tilth" for small grain, especially wheat or barley. We believe in double disking such land, if it is possible to get the work done, and then to drag (harrow) often enough to obtain a fine, mellow, porous seed bed.

It scarcely will pay to rush the crop in "any old way," because help is scarce. Indeed, we think that a small area, well prepared and seeded to the best of seed, will be likely to pay better than a greater area carelessly prepared and seeded to weedy, poor quality seed.

Corn, tobacco and cottom particularly need thorough preparation of the soil if they are to do well. Patriotic farmers will be less concerned about the tobacco crop this year, and we hope that much land previously devoted to that crop will this year be seeded to grain; but it behooves every farmer to give necessary crops as good care and cultivation as possible. To that end we strongly advise against drilling in corn this year. We must keep our farms clean, now that help is scarce, and the better prepared corn and cotton land is, the cleaner will it prove during the growing season. If the corn land is well prepared, and the harrows are kept going until the plants are up a few inches, after cultivation will be easy. Such harrowing is more necessary where corn is drilled, but no matter how well it is done, the drilled corn will become foul with rag weed and foxtail later on, despite constant use of the horse-cultivator. Checkrowing means clean corn, and a maximum yield of matured ears, and on clean, thoroughly dragged land the work is ligh

Applying Manure in Spring

Applying Manure in Spring

On the average farm, manure hauled and spread on the hay and grass ,land during winfer will prove most economical and valuable and it should be spread thin, with a manure spreader, not put on thickly by hand. In many instances where help has been scarce and the winter long and intensely cold, it has been impossible to haul out the manure daily before the spring season set in and on such farms disposal of the manure to the best advantage is sometimes a puzzle. The tobacco and cotton grower, or producer of any special crop, usually concentrates all of the manure upon the field where his special crop is to be grown. He puts it on thick, plows it under and works the land to a fine tilth before seeding. On the average farm the land is so wet and soggy when the frost is coming out that manure spreading is rendered impossible. On such farms and under such conditions it then is best to get the oat crop into the ground just as soon as possible, and without manure, cultivating it in off clean corn-stalk ground by preference, and then top-dress barley land with rotted manure, if such is on hand, and either plow it under or disk it thoroughly before seeding. Disking in rank manure is a poor plan, as the seeder cannot work properly on such land and the harrows also clog badly. All rank manure should be plowed under on fall plowed sod or stubble or on fields where fall plowing was not done. It should be spread as perfectly as possible before plowing and all manure that cannot be plowed under should be turned and rotted to get it into short condition and then should quickly be thinly spread upon hay and pasture land, but this should not be done after the grass is well up, nor is it well to delay spring plowing of sod until the grass has got a good start. All manure that is found impossible to haul and spread or plow under in spring should be collected in a compact heap, spread out four or five feet deep, to be covered with straw or earth, turned once or twice and used as a top dressing immediately a SALT BUSH SEED.—I read in Comfort that some poultrymen recommend Australian salt bush for poultry. Please tell me where I can buy the seed and what it will cost. My good wife and I have been on the farm nearly two years and we are getting on fine. We started with almost nothing, and now have sixteen head of horses and mules, twelve head of cattle, sixteen head of horses and mules, twelve head of cattle, sixteen hogs and a nice lof of chickens and turkeys.

A.—All large seed establishments carry the Australian salt bush seed. The price is about $1.25 a pound, and it takes three pounds to seed an acre. Send to the agricultural department of the University of California, at Berkeley, for their Bulletin No. 125, and to the Department of Agriculture at Washington, D. C., for their Farmers' Bulletin 108. They both deal with the growth of salt bush in this country.

We follow the rations recommended by W. E. Rice, a very experienced pigeon raiser. Morning: Equal parts of cracked corn, Kaffir corn and wheat. Evening: Cracked corn, and Canadian peas. These regular meals are put into the feed boxes in quantity sufficient to insure the birds brooder the heat should be 95 degrees when the chicks are first put in, and kept at about 90 degrees for the first seven days. Then it can be gradually decreased to 85. Thousands of chicks are lost every year from bowel trouble caused by want of warmth at odd times, such as millet, hemp and rice, are thrown on the ground, for, as they are eaten up at once, and so there is no danger of their being spoiled. Remember always to buy red, not white, wheat, for the latter is very apt to cause diarrhea.

Once a week we give them a meal of stale bread which has been steeped in skim milk and squeezed almost dry agaia, for we have lots of skim milk, and the bread we get from a baker in town for twenty-five cents a barrel. Freight costs another twenty-five cents, but even at fifty cents a barrel we find it an economical feed when there are a lot of squabs to be fattened for the market.

The parent birds take all the responsibility of feeding and raising the young right up to the time when they are ready for market. The hen bird lays two eggs, with one day intervening, which take eighteen days to incubate. After the eggs are hatched, both birds devote their entire energies to feeding the youngsters for about two weeks, for both have the power to secrete the predigested substance often called pigeon's milk, on which nestlings are exclusively fed for the first few days. At the end of two weeks the hen has usually laid two more eggs in the second nest, so that by the time the squabs in the first nest are ready for market, the second eggs are ready to hatch. It is this double family which necessitates two nests for each pair of birds.

Cleanliness is even more imperative in the pigeon house than in the henhouse. Never neglect to scald out the earthernware nest and whitewash the compartment it stands in, every time squabs are removed for market, for it is only by such rigid system that the place can be kept in sanitary condition. Pigeons must have shell, salt and charcoal to be healthy, so there should be a self-feeder with three compartments in each house. When ordering, specify that the oyster shell is for pigeons, as it is to be broken up smaller than for the hens. The rock salt and charcoal should be ground to about the size of rice. During the heavy breeding season we crush most of the grain, and always peas, for when the parent birds are rushed for time between their two nests they are very liable to pick up whole grain and feed to the young birds before they are able to digest it. Before we discovered this carelessness, we often had a dead squab in the nest. The feed boxes can be kept filled up, as pigeons never overeat, and must have access to food at all times when they have young ones to feed.

If you start with a few pairs of birds, the best way to increase the number is to sell the

"Then we may?" cried Mrs. Damerel, and boped she blushed, though it would have taken sharper eyes than Levallion's to see it. "I'll tell Lady Levallion. My flower, indeed! We will all be quite secret, and you can guess when you see us." abandoning her choice of the rose of silence for the more exciting mistletoe of kisses. "Oh, Levallion! don't you think the duchess would be lovely as a cauliflower?" in a wicked whisper. "She is so like one."

"I'll inquire," said Levallion briskly, and he did, with Mrs. Damerel's compliments, perfectly aware the duchess detested her.

Ravenel jumped at the proposal, since it would be better than nothing, would pass the time, of which she yet grudged every hopeless, useless minute, since they only brought the day nearer when Adrian would be gone. She looked at the tea-gowned women around her with some interest, though before they had been to her little more than moving shadows who yet must be entertained and amused.

There were only seven, counting herself and the Duchess of Avonmere; for Levallion had no opinion of people who asked ten ordinary husbands and wives to their houses and expected it to be a cheerful gathering. Thirteen men, of whom only two were husbands, kept things stirring. It was no business of Levallion's, where the three uninvited husbands had betaken themselves.

"I believe," she said to herself, "that I know what flower each one of those women will choose!" and she laughed as she sent an order to the greenhouse that every one was to have exactly what their maids asked for.

The thought of her own favorite flower took the color from her cheek. Oh, the white may that had filled the whole world that day that she and Adrian parted—forever—without knowing it. Never again would Lady Levallion smell may of her own free will. She looked up almost guiltily as Levallion spoke to her under cover of getting Mrs. Damerel's second cup of tea.

"You look tired; slip away and rest," he advised, with a look of coldness that was not like him—to her. "And be wise in time, Ravenel; don't wear real flowers tonight, unless you want to resemble the sweepings of Convent Garden!" Lady Levallion nodded.

"It was that shooting; it made me feel sick," hastily; and if he did not believe her, seeing Adrian's face and hers, he liked her courage. If she had come to him and cried and confided, he would have despised her even while he dried her tears. To ease your own soul by piling your (Continued on page 25.)

M. L.—Comfort does not publish any free books on poultry, but we are always glad to give our readers all the information we can in this column.

L. L.—If the birds have always shown the same erratic condition in their droppings, I should imagine they were overfed as youngsters, and have chronic indigestion, but the dry mash which you say is always before them, may cause the irregularities. Notice if the yellow relaxed condition appears each time the hopper is freshly filled. It may contain dried beef scraps which the hens can pick out and eat to excess. It is safer to use meat meal in dry mash that is always before birds, unless you have an automatic hoffper that only allows a very small quantity to come within the birds' reach. Better try a different mash, or feed moist once a day just what the birds would eat up clean in ten minutes.

Garments to Meet Individual Needs

FTER explaining the stitches used in knitting, last month, in this article the desire is to give workers who have mastered the actual manner of working, a clear idea how this knowledge can be used to make garments to meet their individual needs.

It is most usual to find in new, as well as in experienced knitters, that they are absolutely incapable of making just what they wish to, unless exact directions for proceeding can be obtained.

This difficulty can be easily remedied if one

This difficulty can be easily remedied if one will put their mind on the matter, and bear in mind that in knitting any garment or article, one is making a piece of fabric knit to a special size and shape.

If one has a clear idea of what this should be and its relation to the whole garment, then both novice and experienced knitter should be able to originate, or at least modify patterns obtainable, to suit their particular needs. A comprehensive view of the laws governing the shaping of knitted garments will prove of much more value to the earnest worker than any definite set of directions; therefore the question which naturally arises, is, just how should one proceed to make a garment of a certain kind and size without accurate directions?

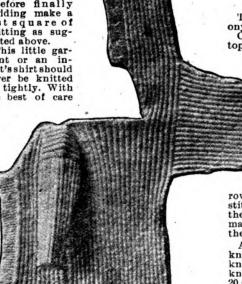

Upon deciding on the best sort of material to use and the right sized needle for the particular article in mind, cast on a couple of dozen stitches and knit or rib until one has a couple of the month of the state stitches and knit or rib until one has a couple of inches, measure this work, counting the number of stitches to the inch, then measure the back front, sleeve, collar or whatever one desires to make, multiply the number of stitches by the number of inches required and cast on the needed number of stitches. For instance, if one is to make the back of a sweater measuring 20 inches and one's sample gives an average of four stitches to the inch, cast on 80 stitches and the finished work will measure 20 inches.

In proving one's work in this way, if the needle used makes the knitting either too loose or too tight, use a different size to remedy this. In knitting for a baby the easiest garment to practice on is a knitted band as this is perfectly straight. For summer wear use two-fold Saxony and for winter threefold Saxony. In purchasing this yarn it is wise to select a soft but well twisted make, as it is to stand constant associa-soft but well twisted constant association with the washtub.

As to needles, a loose knitter should use a No. 18 steel and a tight knitter a No. 16 or perhaps larger.
Before finally deciding make a deciding make a test square of knitting as sugthe wool is certain to shrink somewhat and this should be allowed for. Another reason why too tight knitting should be avoided is because a garment which clings too closely is apt

As to shape this little garment is always straight up and down, with shoulder straps and a little flap which is attached to the lower edge of the front in the center.

If of Saxony and the proper needles, cast 60 stitches on each of three needles and knit in rounds of k. 2, p. 2, until work measures nine inches, make inch and a quarter wide shoulder straps and a two-inch wide flap which can be rounded off to a point by decreasing one stitch each end of needle, every other row after having knit an inch and one half. This garment can also be made on two needles and sewed together if one prefers.

Infant's Shirt

This little garment as shown in our illustration should give one a very clear idea of the manner of making it, for which directions are given below. The work is commenced by casting on the stitches for the lower edge of the back; ribbing is begun immediately and continued until the back is long enough, then the stitches are divided into three portions for the neck and shoulders. The first third is worked, slipped on safety pin the second portion or slipped on safety pin the second portion or number of stitches are bound off for the neck and upon the last portion is worked the first side of the front, followed by the other front and the sleeves.

To make a shirt for a larger child one proceeds in the same manner but knitting to measurements of the length and size of the child's body. A length of ten inches for the first sized shirt provides for a high neck. If a low-necked shirt is preferred the back should be an inch shorter.

Two skeins threefold white Saxony, one pair No. 10 and one pair No. 11 steel knitting needles are required. This little garment is ribbed in both body and sleeves and buttons in the front.

On No 10 needles cast 92 stitches for lower edge of back. K. 2, p. 2 until work measures a full 10 inches, then divide for shoulders and neck as follows, rib 24 stitches as usual, knit and bind off 44 stitches for neck, run the 24 stitches last knitted on safety pin, and work on 24 remaining stitches ribbing 20 rows, increasing one stitch at the inside of neck end of each row.

At end of 20th row at neck end, cast on eight stitches; there should now be 52 stitches upon needle. Turn, knit 8, rib balance as usual. Always knit the eight stitches which form band down the front. Knit until front measures eight inches, 52 stitches wide. Bind off loosely.

Bind off loosely.

Knit on 24 stitches on opposite shoulder in the same way. On this side make buttonholes in strip down the center. Knit 12 rows after casting on 8 stitches.

13th row.—Beginning at front end, k. 2, k t front end, K. 2, K. and bind off 3, k. 2 and rib across as usual.

14th row.—Rib as usual, then k. 2, cast on 3, k. 2. Make a buttonhole in every 12th row down the 13th row down the front.

For the Sleeves

Fold bottoms of shirt together and pick up, stitches on one side for three inches on either side of the shoulder. This will give sleeve six inches in width. Pick up 92 stitches and work in ribbing of depth of one inch. On next row and at end of every third row narrow one stitch until 72 stitch-es remain. Work without decreasing without decreasing until sleeve is four and one half inches long. Change to finer needles and knit one and one half inches for the cuff. Make other sleeve to match.

With finer needles pick up stitches around neck and knit a row of holes as follows; k. 1, * over, k. 2, tog., and repeat from * to end, k. 4 rows in ribbing and bind off.

Sew up from wrist to bottom on each side making a flat seam, add small pearl buttons and run linen bobbing or narrow ribbon through holes of neck.

Baby's Stockings

stitch until all the side stitches have been taken up. K. 36 rows. Next row narrow 1 st., 2 sts. in from end.

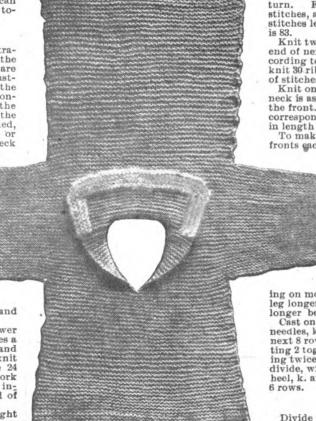

K. 5 rows and again make a narrowed row. Repeat last six rows three times, then knit six rows. The last row should contain forty-two stitches. First instep row.—K. 11, and run them on to a thread. K. 20, then run the remaining 11 sts., on to another thread. Upon the 20 center stitches k. 40 rows for instep tab.

At the end of the last row turn pick up and

At the end of the last row turn, pick up and knit 20 stitches along that side of tab, then knit the 11 stitches held on the cord. Turn, knit to other corner of tab, pick up and knit 20 stitches along that side, then take the remaining stitches from the cord, making 82 stitches upon needles.

Knit ten rows, then ten rows more, and in every second row of the last ten rows, narrow after knitting five stitches each side of the center, and in the final four rows narrow one stitch at each end of every other row. Bind off and sew the stocking up. Finish the top with small crocket scallon.

This garment may be very easily made to fit any sized child if one will first prove their work with the yarn and needles to be used and then make to required measurements as previously explained on this page. Cast on the stitches and work from the bottem of back up to armife then cast on stitches for one sleeve. to armpifs, then east on stitches for one sleeve, knit on these across back and cast on for other

Knit until sleeve is twice the number of ribs it was when neck was reached then bind off loosely from wrist end same number of stitches as were cast on for sleeve. Make four or six ribs more on front and then slip these stitches on pin. Knit other side to match then slip all from stitches on one needle and finish the front. Cuffs: Pick up stitches on sleeves and rib for two inches for cuff.

Collar: Holding outside of back of garment towards one tie extra yarn in sixth stitch from edge of lapel in front as it is folded back towards sleeve or lying as here pictured, carry edge of lapel in front as it is folded back to-wards sleeve or lying as here pictured, carry this thread along drawing up one loop through each stitch, across back and to within six stitches of end of opposite lapel. Knit back and forth for two inches then across width of collar knit four ribs of white Angora or Saxony, increasing one stitch at end every other row, bind off. Pick up stitches along side of collar, increase to form corner and make front edge straight, sew this to six stitches of lapel and sew up the corners with white wool. Entire collar of one color could of course be made instead. Sew up sweater from bottoms to under arms and from wrists to the same point.

To make a sweater which will be sure to fit, take your measurements and prove your work as heretofore explained.

but prove their work instead of making a guess.

The length of any sweater can be decided by measuring the back from the arm pits and due allowance should be made for stretching, as all knitting will do so more or less, according to whether the work is close and firm, or loose.

To determine the length of

To determine the length of sleeves, take the lower edge of the back of the sweater and measure from arm pit out to within five or six inches of hand if one is to finish the sleeve with a cuff, then count the stitches and one will have the number required. This is the only way to make a sleeve of just the proper length for a particular individual as arms vary as much as people do in all other ways.

A strip of linen eight inches long and two and a half wide with buttonholed edges and snap fastener makes a convenient holder to snap about papers to keep together.

Made of four-ply Scotch and No. 5 needle proceed as follows. Cast on 80 stitches, rib for nine inches knitting four and purling four then plain knitting for 18 or more ribs or until the work measures to armpit, placing top of ribbing at one's high waistline.

Castron 55 stitches for medium length arm or measure and count for actual number needed as explained, knit 30 ribs, count stitches on needle, subtract 24 for neck, divide remaining stitches from the wrist knitting one half the number, slip these on extra needle, cord or pin. Bind off neck stitches, knit to other wrist, turn. For example starting back with 80 stitches, adding 55 for each sleeve totals 190 stitches less 24 for neck gives 166, half of which is 83.

Knit two ribs from wrist to neck, at neck end of next row, cast on 12 or 16 stitches according to whether model is flat or full chested, knit 30 ribs. Bind off loosely the same number of stitches which were cast on for sleeves. Knit on remaining stitches until length from neck is as long as one wishes the opening in the front. Make the other sleeve and side to correspond; then complete front to match back in length and bind off losely.

To make an open front sweater finish the fronts each separately without joining.

tions will result in small boots suitable for the first month or six weeks. A larger pair may be made by using three or fourfold Saxony and a suitable needle or in making, one may easily follow these directions in a general way, but enlarge as desired by casting on more stitches and then in making the leg longer before turning the heel and the foot longer before narrowing for the toe.

Cast on 17 stitches of Zephyr on each of three needles, knit plain 1 row, k. 2, p. 2, for 8 rows, next 8 rows thread over needle, narrow by knitting 2 together, knit plain for 16 rows, narrowing twice in every 4th row to reduce for ankle, divide, with the narrowed sts. on needle for the heel, k. and p. back and forth on these sts. for 6 rows.

Turn the Cap of Heel

Divide the stitches evenly, half on one needle for the instep and dividing the other half so as to knit two thirds of stitches plain and narrow one stitch on the other needle, turn purl across and narrow the first stitch of the one third of stitches on the other needle, work back and forth, narrowing each row till every stitch is knitted and the cap formed. Pickaup selvage stitches down one side of heel, k. plain, pick up six stitches on the other side and k. back plain, now narrow one stitch, every other round until instep is exactly the same number of stitches as the ankle, k. plain 16 rows, narrow one stitch at each end of the needles every other round till but two stitches remain. Bind off.

Knitted Roseleaf Bedspread

For making this a soft finished knitting cotton is preferable. Steel needles Nos. 12 or 14 according to the size of the cotton, or small bone needles, may be used.

Knit in sections of two or three; repeat the roseleaf pattern for this allowing seventeen stitches with two stitches for each purled strip between; excepting on outer edges, then three stitches make a better selvage.

Easter Escapade Billy Bun's

Copyright, 1918, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

ON'T be ready for Easter!
Ought to have been at it weeks ago! When I was young we never waited till the last minute!" So grumbled Grampy Gray, as he who were decorating Easter eggs.

"Now, now!" chided Grammie Gray, mildly, patting his long ears with a gentle paw. "It ain't going to help 'em any, talking like that! A little late, to be sure, but they're smart, Grampy, and they'll get 'em done in time, see if they don't!"

Ferdie Frisk and Sammie Springer, who had been ready to throw down their eggs at Grampy's scolding, cheered up at this, smiled at Grammie, and worked faster than ever.

It was a sight worth seeing—all the bunnies at work on the Easter eggs, getting them ready to fill the nests where the children might find them on Easter morning. Big fires were burning under the dye kettles, where the eggs were boiling. Rows of the colored eggs, red, pink, blue, yellow and green, were drying in the sun. Artistic bunnies were painting daisies and roses on the eggs, and stripes and stars of gold and silver paper were glued on to make them more beautifully dazzling.

The eggs were all finished, hundreds and hundreds of them, the night before Easter. Then, carefully carrying them in baskets, the bunnies started out, by the light of the moon, just past its fullness, to put them in the nests. Grampy and Grammie Gray stayed at home, and a few others, but most of them went—Lopey Longears and Nannie Nibbler, carrying a basket between them, Whaley Whitey, old Fleetfoot and Racer, Mrs. Bun, Ferdy Frisk, Sammie Springer, Callie Cottontail—oh, so many I couldn't name them all. Little Billy Bun had pleaded to go with the rest.

"No, no," his mother had told him. "It's too far, and I can't be bothered with you. You'll be Little Billy Bun had pleaded to go with the rest.

"No, no," his mother had told him.
"It's too far, and I can't be bothered with you. You'll be quite safe asleep in Grampy's house."

Billy whined. It wasn't safety he wanted, but fun.

Wherever the bunnies thought any children would look for the eggs—under bushes, in henhouses, sheds and barns, in clumps of grass, and sometimes right in the open paths, they made nests and left behind them their beautiful treasures.

Next morning, Lopey Longears was wakened from a delightfully exciting dream by a pounding at the door. He sat up, quite startled. The spring sunshine was flooding the place, and a bird somewhere nearby was trilling happily. At the door he found Mrs. Bun, her face quivering with grief.

the door he found Mrs. Bun, her face quivering with grief.

"Oh, Lopey Longears!" she cried, "my little Billy! You must help me to get him home again. He did not stay behind as I told him to last night. I thought he was with Grampy until I went for him this morning. He must have followed us and got lost!"

Other rabbits joined them, and they started out on their search for little Billy.

All that day they looked for him, in the woods and fields, even venturing near some of the farmhouses, but nowhere was he to be found, "When night comes, I shall go into the village to look for him!" declared Mrs. Bun, her eyes red with weeping.

"I wouldn't dare!" shuddered timid Callie Cottontail. "I shall just go to bed and sleep, for I am tired."

"But you are not his mother!" said Mrs. Bun.

my beautiful little Billy! He is shut up there, and he is crying for his mother! We will get him out, if we have to gnaw down the buildings."

"Wait!" cried Fleetfoot, who was fumbling with the wooden button that fastened the door. "We need not do that, I can open the door for him. Help me here, somebody!"

A dozen paws were ready to help, and the rabbits were soon crowding in. Two tame rab"He is right," said one of the town. You stay here our friends around us?"

All the bunnies stared with wide-open, round "He is right," said one of the town.

"What," faltered poor Mrs. Bun." "Oh, Billy! leave our nice little home in the forest, with all our friends around us?"

All the bunnies stared with wide-open, round eyes.

"He is right," said one of the tame rabbits, whose name was Pinkie, "It is much better here than in the forest. In the winter, Fuzzy and I have a nice, warm place to stay, and we are never hungry; such quantities of food are brought to us—everything we like. And then, there are the children. They pet us, and we have fine times playing with them."

"The children!" cried Mrs. Bun, with terror in her eyes. "Oh, Billy! they must never get you! Come with me, quick!"

"But I like the children!" said little Billy. "They are good and kind to me, and smooth my fur. But I like you, too, and I like Lopey Longears, and all the others! Why can't you all stay here?"

"Yes," urged Pinkie and Fuzzie. "All of you would never have to hunt around for food. No one would hart you. You would have straw for beds, and be comfortable and happy. Think of the frolies and races we would have on this big, smooth lawn!"

"I will try it," said Mrs. Bun at last, fearfully. "If Billy likes it, perhaps I shall too, in time. And I will never leave him."

"Ferdie Frisk laughed. "Let us all stay!" he urged. "It will be great fun."

"They could never shut us up—so many of us," said Whaley, "and if we did not like it, why, we could go back home any night."

"In am going back to the forest," said Racer, "not to stay, but to bring Grampy and Grammie Gray, Callie Cottontail and the rest. We must not leave them behind."

Morning was drawing near, and the eastern sky grew rosy as Racer went bounding away.

The bunnies all settled down to wait.

"I am hungry," said Billy Bun. "I hope it is almost breakfast time. You will see what nice things the children can bring us."

"Yes," said Grammie, carefully brushing some dost from the window, "we will live here always."

so many?"
She had not long to wonder.
Rover Dog came bounding out through the shed door, and seeing the bunnies, dashed among them, barking noisily.
"Run for your lives!" cried Grampy Gray shrilly. "We shall stay here!" And he banged the door, fastening it on the inside.
In fifteen seconds, not a rabbit was left in sight, excepting Pinkie and Fuzzy, who knew that Rover Dog would not hurt them.
When they were safe in the forest once more, the frightened bunnies stopped to rest a yhile and get their breath.
"I shall never go near the village again," gasped Callie Cottontail, "though I live to be old—old! I should have known-better this time!"
Mrs. Bun was holding Billy firmly by the paw,

"Ah, well!" she said. "I have my little Billy safe with me again, and I am happy, for that was all I wanted!"

THE AWAKENING

By Anna Bird Stewart

It is interesting to note that John Hay, Ellsworth's intimate and devoted friend, was a young m strong character and marked ability and rose to take an important part in national and international affairs.

As President Lincoln's private secretary he was trusted with the war secrets of the government. After Lincoln's death he attained celebrity as an author; with Nicolay he wrote the Life of Abraham Lincoln. Later, as Ambassador to England he reflected credit on himself and his country, and as Secretary of State in President Roosevelt's cabinet he became distinguished as one of the greatest if not the greatest of statesmen that ever held that exalted office.

Ellsworth and Hay are samples of the kind of men Lincoln called to assist him in administering the affairs of Government in war time.—EDITOR.

"At two in the morning." said the General "Good linek, Colonel Elisworth."

On the night of the twenty-third of May the young officer called his men into line.

"Boys," he said, "yesterday I understood that a movement was to be made against Alexandria I went to General Mansheld and told him that I would consider it as a personal affront if we were not allowed the right of the line, which is our due as the first volunteer regiment sworn in for the war. All I can say is, prepare yourselves for a nice little sail and at the end of it, possibly, a skirmish. Go to your tents, lie down and take your rest until two o'clock. At that hour the boat will arrive and we shall go forward. When we reach the place of destination, I hardly need bid you act as men. Do nothing to shame the regiment. Show the enemy that you are indeed men as well as soldiers. Prove to them that you will treat them with kindness until they force you to use violence. I want fairly to overcome them with good will. Go to your tents now and do as I have told you."

He went to his own tent where he found Major Oliver awaiting him.

"You sent for me, Colonel?"

"Yes, Major Oliver. I want you, in case anything should happen to ne, to know just where we stand. We go to Alexandria on condition of good behavior. If any deeds of misbelinvior or violence are committed by our men, we are to be mistered out of service."

"Threaten them with that disgrace," said the Major, "and they'll be hamb like."

"I don't threaten," said Elisworth, "I don't need to do so. I fear nothing from my men. My purpose was shaply to explain the thing to you deed the letter, he could almost see her befor

"She will understand," he said, as he began a second letter, "The last of the Ellsworths," he thought on. "Poor mother and father, if anything should happen, it would go hard with them - the only one left." He read the second letter ways to himself. letter over to himself.

"My dear father and mother;
"The regiment is ordered to move across the river tonight. We have no means of knowing what reception we are to meet with. I am inclined to the opinion that our entrance to the city of Alexandria will be hotly contested, as I am informed that a large force has arrived there today. Should this happen, my dear parents, it may be my lot to be injured in some manner. Whatever may happen, cherish the consolation that I was engaged in the performance of a sacred duty; and tonight, thinking of the probabilities of tomorrow, and the occurrences of the past, I am perfectly willing to accept whatever my fortune may be, confident that He who noteth the fall of a sparrow, will have some purpose even in the fall of one like me. My darling and ever loved parents, good by, God bless, protect and care for you. Elmer."

Then he turned sharply, "Sergeant."
The sergeant saluted.
"Go back to the regiment and order Captain Coyle with Company A here as quickly as possible. Keep the rest of the men out of sight."
As the sergeant started back with the order, Ellsworth went on speaking. "That flag must come down."
"That's madness," cried one of his guard.
"It's prindence," Ellsworth corrected, quietly, "Why doesn't be wait," the man at the rear whispered to his neighbor. "There will be time enough later on for that reckless sort of patriotism."

Ellsworth had sharp ears and he turned quick-

"Elmer," she called, almost involuntarily.

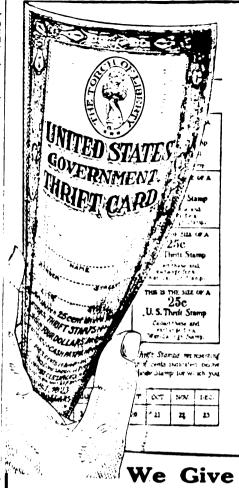

He came back into the hallway and closed the door.

"Yes, dear?"

"I just couldn't let you go. I had to say good by again." The tears welled up into her eyes.

Then he too, felt that there were some words that cried out to be spoken.

War Thrift Stamps!

For Every Club Of Two We Send You One 25-Cent Stamp Free!

D O you want to help win the war but feel financially unable to buy Liberty Bonds or War Thrift Stamps?

Here then is your opportunity to do your bit and yet not invest a cent of your own money. COMFORT is willing to buy 25-Cent War Thrift Stamps and give them to you in place of a premium or cash commission. By following our easy plan you will soon have enough Stamps to fill a Thrift Card. Then you can start all over again and fill another Card without expense to yourself, help furnish your touring with the money it needs in order to feed, clothe, arm and equip our soldiers and sailors and win this rightcous war in defence of American honor and the cause of democracy throughout the world.

Thrift Stamps—What Are They?

These 25-Cent U. S. War Thrift Stamps are the safest security in the World. They are the equivalent of "little baby bonds." Like Liberty Bonds, they have behind them the entire resources of the United States.

the equivalent of "Hitle baby bonds." Like Chiberty Bonds, they have behind them the entire resources of the United States.

These Thrift Stamps themselves hear no interest, but they can be exchanged for the larger War-Savings Stamps which do bear interest. When you have filled your Thrift Card with sixteen 25. Cent Thrift Stamps, you are to surrender it to any post office, bank or other authorized agency, pay a few cents in cash -13 cents in March, 14 cents in April, and so on, adding I cent each month—and receive in return a $5 War-Savings Stamp, With this Stamp you will also receive a War-Savings Certificate, containing spaces for twenty of these $5 War-Savings Stamps, If you should fill the twenty spaces with $5 War-Savings Stamps, If you should fill the twenty spaces with $5 War-Savings Stamps before May 1 1918, the cost to us as we are really buying the stamps for you—would be $83,00, and on Jan. 1, 1923, the Government will pay you $100—a net profit of $17. In other words, your War-Savings Stamps—which you get in exchange for your 25-Cent Thrift Stamps—will hear 4 per cent, interest, compounded quarterly. Please understand, however, that you are not obliged to fill your War-Savings Certificates before May 1, 1918. We simply used that date to illustrate what the stamps bring you in interest, you actually have until 1923 to purchase the stamps. But of course the sooner you secure them the more you will gain in interest on your investment. Therefore it's up to you to fill your Thrift Cards with 25-Cent Thrift Stamps as soon as possible, in order to exchange them for the larger $5 War-Savings Stamps that pay you 4 per cent, interest, compounded quarterly, from Jan. 2, 1918.

You Can Help Win The War By Starting A Thrift Card Today!

Every 25-Cent Thrift Stamp which you buy, or seed to free on this offer, strikes a blow at our enemies and hastens the victorious ending of the war. And at the same time you are investing money in the best and safest security in the world. We consider that it is our duty to describe this War-Savings Thrift Plan to our subscribers and offer the Thrift Stamps to our cub-raisers instead of premitting or cash commission. We have made our offer as liberal as we possibly could in order to make it easy for all to earn the stamps. By accepting our offer you can obtain all the 25-Cent Thrift Stamps you want without paying any money yourself. We shall buy the stamps and give them to you in return for subscriptions to COMPORT. When ordering please be sure ito state whether you have parchased Thrift Stamps before and already have your Thrift Card, or whether you wish us to send a Thrift Card with your Stamps we do not send the Thrift Card unless specially requested.

Our Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each to COMFORT at 25 cents each stamp free and prepaid. For four one-year subscriptions we will send you two Stomps for six one-year subscriptions we will send you three Stamps—and so on. With regard to the cost item, one owner of a private electric system declares it to be the cheapest method of lighting.

This owner concluded that twenty cents per room per month, which it was costing to light his eighteen-room house, was an excessive rate, and he therefore began to consider purchasing an electric system. He had it installed and now generates his own electric current and stores it in a storage battery. He enthusiastically reports that at a cost of one dollar and sixty-four cents per month be lights the eighteen-room house, a nine-room tenant house and two barns. This figures six cents per month per room with the barns free.

Another owner installed a beltiess plant costing two hundred and fifty dollars. The expense for wiring and fixtures was one hundred and sixty-five dollars.

out. We never seen a submarine on our entire voyage. I seen my first whale on our voyage and from the size of it it must have been the one that swallowed Jonah. With love to you and all the cousins, I am, as ever your nephew, JOHN W. MORRISON.

Jonah. With love to you and all the cousins, I am, as ever your nephew, JOHN W. MORISON.

John, you are the first of our soldier cousins to write us from France, and we shall all take a personal interest in you and expect you to win the war for us and bring the Kaiser and his sixty-six sons home in your knapsack, then we'll let Billy the Goat butt the stuffing out of them. Sorry it is so rainy and muddy. It seems absurd you cannot tell us what part of France you are in, for everyone in Germany knows, and it seems that we might as well know too. It is no secret however, what part of the line our troops are holding; it is only supposed to be a secret. Glad you had such a nice voyage across, John, and it is too bad you got seasick on the twelfth day. After holding your own for twelve days you might have made a gallant effort to have kept it down for a few more hours without spilling the beans. Maybe you had hot dogs on the twelfth day instead of beans, and they decided they wanted a swim. It has been an awful joit to those traitorous enemy plotters and sympathizers, hyphenates and pacifist croakers to know that we have sent some hundreds of thousands of troops to France without a single transport being sunk or a soldier boy lost. A lot of these ungrateful America haters wrote me when the war broke out and said: "Of course no American troops will ever get over there anyway. The German U Boats will get them all." But murderous Fritz as usual guessed wrong as black-hearted pests of his type usually do. Your experiences, John, have so excited me that I am going to write a book called "The Ballads Of A Simple Sallor." Here is my first irruption.

I never seen a submarine,

I never seen a submarine, I never seen a whale, But a mermaid with a pówder puff I seen tied to her tail.

If the whale had only swallowed the Kaiser instead of Jonah what a peaceful, happy world this would have been, a world without wails. God bless and keep you John, and bring you back safe to home and loved ones.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a girl fifteen years old. I go to a country school that is three miles from home and am in the seventh grade. Our teacher wants us to do something every Tuesday morning for the opening exercise and some of them sing, read or tell stories and some don't do anything. The last time I told a story, but can't think of anything to do the next time. Can you suggest something that I can do? There is twenty-five coming to our school and we have fine time playing basket ball. Every Friday we spell or cipher. The teacher divides us the best he can and one half tries to spell more words than the other half. I wrote you once before but I guess the goat got the letter.

Your niece,

MARTHA HOPKINS.

Martha, if you want to do something really worth while at your morning exercises, start a discussion about the war. But I hear you say: "Uncle Charlie I don't know anything about the war." Exactly, and it is a thousand to one that teacher knows very little about it, though it is his business to know all about it, and if he doesn't the school authorities should replace him with someone who does. If you have a moment's spare time take your knitting to school and work like a steam engine, while teacher gives you a war talk. Get him, too, to read aloud my COMFORT war talks, and have him send to the (CONTINUED ON PAGE 28.)

Cocoanut Oil Makes A Splendid Shampoo

If you want to keep your hair in good condition, be careful what you wash it with.

Most soaps and prepared shampoos contain too much alkali. This dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle, and is very harmful. Just plain mulsified cocoanut oil (which is pure and entirely greaseless), is much better than the most expensive soap or anything else you can use for shampooing, as this can't possibly injure the hair.

Simply moisten your hair with water and rub it in. One or two teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather, and cleanses the hair and scalp thoroughly. The lather rinses out easily and removes every particle of dust, dirt, dandruff and excessive oil. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and it leaves it fine and silky, bright, fluffy and easy to manage.

You can get imulsified cocoanut oil at most any drug store. It is very cheap, and a few ounces is enough to last everyone in the family for months.

Westfield Kid, Westfield, Tex.—No, it is not "wraung" for a sixteen-year-old girl to talk with boys, but it is decidedly wrong for her to talk with and think about them so much that she neglects her lessons. Stick to your school for a while longer, and let the boy question wait until you can write a better letter than the one you sent to this department. Remember, no man can be proud of an ignorant wife.

Anxious, Franklin, N. C.—Write to your friend in the same way that you would talk to him if he were present. If you do this, you will interest him and he will be glad to get your letters. There is no more need for stilted phrasing when you write to him, than there would be if you were talking to him over the telephone, for instance. (2) Be cordial and pleasant when any one is introduced to you, and say any simple thing that the circumstances make apt. If you have heard of the person before, through friends or otherwise, you might say-so, and express pleasure at your having met. Avoid set forms, like: "I am very glad to meet you." The simplest and best way is to smile, shake hands, and enter into any chat that the time and place make appropriate. Brown Eyea, Indianola, Okla.—We are sure, Brown Eyes, that some mother is neglecting her duty if you, a girl of 15, can write that you are in love with a young man of 28, and ask if it is wrong for you to let him kiss you, and for you to go walking with him at night. You know that you could not think of marriage for some years yet, and you are only preparing sorrow and trouble for yourself. Of course, he is now paying attention to this other girl of twenty-three. He has only been amusing himself with you. You should tell your mother or some older woman about the whole affair and get their advice. And in the meantime, study hard at school, and forget this man, who is almost double your age.

D. O., Mt. Idaho, Idaho.—We judge by one discouraged phrase in your letter that you have had difficulty in makityn procress.

D. O., Mt. Idaho, Idaho.—We judge by one discouraged phrase in your letter that you have had difficulty in making progress with this girl that interests you so much. But you must remember that you are only seventeen and that she is two years older and that you fail to attract her as seriously as you might if you were older and more the age of a husband. However, if you have met her several times so far, there is absolutely nothing to prevent your asking if you might call to see her, or inviting her to attend some local entertainment with you. But don't blame our advice if she turns you down, as we very much think she will. Your luck will be better when you have a few more years on your shoulders. And that will come quickly enough—and there are valways plenty of "inice girls."

are always plenty of "nice girls."

D. S., Piagah, Ala.—If you want to walk home with a girl from church, let her know by saying so, and this would mean asking: "May I walk home with you? I would like to very much." Easy, is it not? (2) A man introduces his men friends very simply to each other: "Bob, this is my friend, Tom Jones. You've heard me talk of Bob Smith before, baven't you, Jones?" Or more formally, a simple mention of names, and a handshake, will suffice: "Mr. Jones, Mr. Smith." Other ways would be: "Jones, I want you to know Mr. Smith," or, "Jones, I want you to meet Mr. Smith. Mr. Smith, Mr. Jones." There are enough ways to choose from. When there is much disparity in ages the older man should be named first.

Only last summer I sold chickens to get myself and two boys our clothes and bought my husband's besides, in order to get him to go to church and other places with us as other husbands do. And still he accuses me of extravagance and "wanting to be in style." Nona Watson.—It is certainly dear of you to suggest a needlework shower for me and I'm 'most, if not quite, as pleased as though I had received it. I don't mind admitting that you came within just a few days of guessing my birthday (please, good people, don't ask how old I am) since this is to be published in March and too late for presents. No one can accuse me of graft now, and, besides, I'd rather our soldier and sailor boys had all the warm sweaters, socks and helmets they need so much, than a continuous and heavy shower of needlework for myself. The knowledge that you were willing to do it helps so much and I thank you. You are kind hearted and generous, as your Cheerful Club alone shows, and I hope you get hundreds of members.—Ed.

DEAR MES. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

A few months ago, when I was living in Montana, I wrote, urging the sisters who had no children to adopt one. For we know by experience how dear to us is our adopted child. I want to tell Perplexed Mother about our little adopted daughter. We have a son, our own by birth. When he was eight years old, knowing we could never have any more of our own, we decided to adopt a little girl baby. We got in touch with a Children's Home and through that home we had a little girl, seven wecks old, brought to us. Her very dependence on us for love and care made us feel in a few hours that we could not part with her. She is now nearly eight years old, and neither my husband nor myself love her any less than our son. He is now sixteen years old and loves her like an own sister. Perplexed Mother, before you adopt one, appeal to your little daughter's sympathy by telling her about the poor little babies who have no homes, no Mammas to love them and give them the care they need. Get her, if possible, to feel that she would like to share her home with one of them. If you have no preference let her decide whether, she wants a little brother or sister. I am sure she will soon bearn to love it and if you take a baby a few weeks old it will soon win its way to your heart.

I think Lonely One is very selfish. Besides that, she is denying her husband that which most married men are proud of and have a right to expect, the privilege of being father to one of their own flosh and blood. And how much she is losing herself, for there is nothing sweeter than the love of a darling little baby and nothing unites the bond between husband and wife more strongly than a little child in the home. We sire always wishing we were financially able to support them and then we would adopt several of the little bables who have no homes.

I hope this letter will be printed for I want to convince my husband that the sisters' letters are

Mrs. Panks.—I wonder—will you assume your most I-told-you-so expression when you show your published letter to friend husband or will you let him find out for himself. I think the latter the better plan for even the best of men object strongly to having their mistakes pointed out to them.—Ed.

DEAR MES. WILKINSON AND ALL COMPORT SISTERS:
Will you let a farmer girl enter your happy and helpful circle? I am the adopted child of two old persons. We live in a little log house on an eighty-acre farm in the northern part of Wisconsin. We moved here two years ago. We used to live in a small city but I prefer farm life. My motto is: "Farm life is the best of life and it's the life for me." COMFORT is very helpful to us and I always read the Sisters' Corner first. Some of the sisters say they (CONTINUED ON PAGE 27.)

The men lifted their little Colonel from the stairway.

Convulsively his hand grasped at his heart. It felt a golden circlet with the bloodstaired words, "Non solum nobis sed pro patria."

"The fiar," he gasped. Then he lay silent. And down the street came the muffled tread of his Fire Zouaves.

John liny brought the message to the President who had loved the boy as his own son. Lincoln said little. But Hay, as is the way with youth, must speak out from the bitterness of his heart. He paced back and forth with a torrent of words that spent itself and broke forth again.

"The waste of war," he said, "the sinful waste. Poor Elmer. With world possibilities for fame and usefulness * * * A soldier who never saw a battle * * * * Killed by the first gun he ever heard fired in strife * * * We know that he was the greatest military genius among us, superior in natural capacity to our older leaders in command."

He paused a moment in his eulogy and his voice grew bitter with the hopelessness of proving to the world his own belief. "Had Napoleon Bonaparte been killed at the siege of Toulon, who would have listened to some grief-stricken comrade's assertion that this young Corsican was the greatest soldier since Carar?

"Who can prove Ellsworth's worth now? His short life was so brave and so inspiring; his death so useless, so wasted!"

Lincoln looked up slowly. His deep-set eyes seemed to plerce through the sorrows of the moment into the future.

"Not wasted," he said simply. "Our people are asleep. Here in the North the war is upon them and they do not know it. Only a great calamity can rouse them. For two years Ephraim Elmer Ellsworth has been in the public eye and heart, the people's hero of romance and reality. If, as I truly believe, his death can wake the nation, what greater life could we have wished him?"

Why Physicians Prescribe Nuxated Iron to Help Increase Strength and Endurance and Build up Weak, Nervous, Rundown Folks.

What every soldier most needs is tremendous "stay there" strength, power and endurance, with nerves of steel and blood of iron. To help produce this result there is nothing in my experience which I have found so valuable as organic iron—Nuxated Iron, says Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly Physician of Bellevue Hospital (Out-door Dept.) New York, and the Westchester County Hospital. "I have personally found it of such great value as a tonic, strength and fighting men would

Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital, (Outdoor Dept.) It is surprising how many people suffer from iron deficiency and do not know it. If you are not strong or well you owe it to yourself to make the following test: See how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. E now have with us March, the month supposed to be so lionlike in entrance but so lamblike in departure, but if it is any worse than the preceding months have been, it will break all previous records for lionlike behavior. But what do we care if it is? We have the blessed knowledge that Spring is on its way with the usual quota of spring breezes, spring flowers, spring clothes, spring poems, spring freekles, spring colds and spring tonics. And the last two items deserve more consideration than is usually accorded them. Moral: Wear your winter "undies" a while longer and help Nature a little by a good tonic and careful attention to diet—not forgetting to Hooverize a little. A healthy person is usually cheerful and better able to cope with difficulties than the person who has neglected his, or her, health, but goodness me, I must get to work immediately.

The first letter I open is from an Unloved Girl from Greenwood, Texas, who says she is a "nice young lady," but that another girl has stolen her beau and she knows it because the last time he called on her he never kissed her good by and always before he never could hug and kiss her too much, and that she kisses the boys because she "just can't resist their pleadings." Isn't she the tender-hearted thing? For further proof of that she doesn't want to go with other boys because she is afraid it would hurt him and she doesn't want to cause him "a minute's pain." She is generous, too, for she asks me if I think a birthday present would renew his love for her. I leave it to you, cousins, isn't she silly? In the first place, "nice young ladies" don't kiss boys, regardless of how much they plead, and some of them are great little pleaders, and it is very evident that she allowed her fickie beau to kiss her too much, else he would not have tired of her. His conscience doesn't seem to trouble him very much, so far as hurting you is concerned, so why should you treat him with so much consideration? And above all things, don't send him a birthday present. You don't want to buy his love, do you? Love can't be bought. Forget him, and let this teach you to be less generous with your kisses. Don't chase after him or any other boy; it is a sure way to drive him off. Let the boys do the chasing.

I. A. B., Fuller's, N. C.—Don't accept money from any man, not even your fiance. Wait until you are his wife—provided he is as generous after marriage as before. Some men are not.

Oklahoma Maiden, Waynoke, Okla.—You are too young and too small to wear a shirt-waist and skirt, and, anyway, one-piece dresses are lots prettier. Can't you find something suitable among the Compour Fair Beauty, Greenwood, Texas.—I don't think you feel so very badly because your soldier sweetheart has not written if you can console yourself with a thirty-seven year old grass widower. What's the matter? Aren't there any young men left in Greenwood? Of course you did wrong to sit in his lap, but I'll forgive you if you will promise not to do it again. (2) I should say it was very rude of a boy to put his foot in your lap while he, or you, laced his shoe—unless, of course, you like to be used as a footstool.

Sammie and Johnnie, Marlow, Okla.—Tell the young man who threatens to "quit" you unless you let him kiss you that you value your self respect more than his particular brand of friendship, love or kisses and that the sooner he quits the better pleased you will be. It is perfectly proper to kiss your fiance good by. (2) Don't feel badly if your soldier boy sends cards to two other girls, just as long as he writes to you every day and tells you all about it. I don't think he means any harm. But even if he should, don't worry about it, for there are lots of other boys.

E. A., Berry, Ky.—One hundred and sixty-four

E. A., Berry, Ky.—One hundred and sixty-four pounds weight for a girl five feet, five inches tall, doesn't sound as though her health were completely broken down, but I'll take your word for it. Your parents did wrong in keeping you out of school and if they are very unkind to you and overwork you now I think you are justified in finding work elsewhere. Don't decide too hastily, for, after all, home is a pretty good place.

N. B., Binghampton, N. Y.—I should think you would respect your mother's memory more than to chum with girls she objected to, even if you resented your fance's attitude in the matter. That shows he has your welfare at heart, though I do think he should have asked you to discontinue their acquaintance, rather than commanded you to. Lots of girls don't use judgment and are not particular enough about their associates, and don't know the value of a dollar, and maybe he is right in saying all these things about you, but it seems to me that he is very tactless and critical—especially before you are married to him. Most of them reserve their criticisms until after marriage. Profit by his criticisms, my dear, even though they rankle, but tell him he has your permission to look elsewhere for a sweetheart with all the virtues you, apparently, do not possess. Hasn't he any faults?

do not possess. Hasn't he any faults?

Heartbroken Sweetheart, Greenville, Pa.—Such a silly little girl—in love with a soldier whom she has never seen and wants to know if she should promise to marry him if he returns from France. Don't you know that such foolishness as yours is one of the reasons why our government has put its foot down on correspondence between soldiers and women they are not personally acquainted with? When you mean "have to," please don't spell it "hafto."

Brown Eyes, Sulphur Springs, Texas.—The doctor, you mention, who puts his arm around you and gives you a "loving and friendly look," is guilty of gross impropriety and unprofessional conduct. Susan, Saline, Kans.—If you truly love each other and intended to be married soon anyway, don't hesitate because he may soon march away as a soldier. Instead, be proud that you are a soldier's wife, but don't marry just to be a "war bride."

don't marry just to be a "war bride."

C. C., Detroit, Mich.—I was much interested in your description of this, apparently, model young man, but, my dear, I don't know what you should say to him, because, you see, I don't know what he asked you. Tell him you will think it over, and in the meantime tell me what he said and I'll do my best to help you. And I'm quite curious to know what he said, too. Maybe it was something very important, as, for instance: "Do you pick the bones out of sardines before you eat them?" and in that case I wouldn't want you to answer hastily.

Tootste Little Bock, Ark.—No, you don't weigh too

Tootsie, Little Rock, Ark.—No, you don't weigh too much. About right, I should say. Your spelling is good, but your penmanship is awful, positively awful, and your grammar likewise, but don't feel bad because I scold, for I'm a hateful old thing, but just keep on trying to do better. Don't write to this boy too often and don't kiss him sgain.

Blue Eyes, Wilkinsville, S. C.—No, it isn't wrong for you to love a man who neglects you in the presence of others, but it is extremely foolish of you. Die for him if you want to, that's your privilege, but it would be more sensible to care for another who cared more for you, but suit yourself.

Brown Eyes, Ramer, Tenn.—This poor girl's flance "dosent write but once a week and I dont fell like he appreshates me as he should." Isn't that just too pitiful fow words? Well, Brown Eyes, all I have to say is this—if your letter to me is a fair sample of the kind you write to him, he deserves a medal for writing even once a week. If I were in his place I'd make it once a year, and leap-years at that.

There, most of your questions are answered and it has been a labor of love, too—in spite of the fact that I scolded—for I love the silly ones just as much as I do the sensible ones, and maybe a tiny bit more because they need it more, just as they need more scolding. I do that because I want all of you to be noile, sensible girls that I can be proud of and I know you are trying your very best to be all that and more, too.

HE English Methuselah," is a title deservedly applied to Thomas Parr, born in Shropshire, England, in the year 1483. He was a farmer's son and worked at home with his father till he was about fifteen years old, when he became a servant. At the age of thirty-five he inherited his father's land and returned to the farm. He did not marry until 1563, when he was eighty years old. His wife and two children having died, he married again in 1605, at the age of 122. He worked actively at his little farm until 1635, when he was 152 years old.

He had by this time become famous for his old age, and Lord Thomas Howard brought him to London, to be presented to the king and court. He was well received, but the change from his quiet country home to the strange, exciting scenes of London affected his health, and late in 1635 he died at Lord Howard's home in London.

The Obstacle to Peace

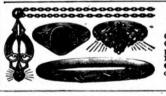

The Obstacle to Peace

The chief obstacle of peace is the profound mistrust which the misdeeds of the German Govment have fastened on the country. So long as the German people continue to believe in their government and place their lives at the disposal of a government which is both hated and despised by the rest of the world, so long must our blows against the rulers of Germany fall on the German people. Their remedy is in their own hands. The German Government is a millstone round the neck of Germany. With it Germany may drown, but the fault will be, not with the Allies, but with the German people for preferring bondage to liberty.—Manchester Guardian.

Dear Sir:

Hon.

We believe that the flat rate of a cent a pound for second-class postage has been of inestimable benefit by facilitating and promoting the dissemination of knowledge, and that the magazines, which by means of this low flat rate have been enabled to build up a nation-wide circulation spreading information to the remotest nooks and corners of the land, constitute one of the greatest, most unifying and beneficent educational forces in the country. We earnestly protest against grading second-class postage on any zone rate basis as being class legislation aimed against the magazines and an unjust sectional discrimination against the people dwelling in parts remote from the large centers of population.

Therefore, we respectfully request you to exert your influence and give your vote in Congress in favor of the repeal of the zone rate (before they take effect in July), and for making the second-class postage rate, thereafter as heretofore, one and the same, level and uniform throughout the Union regardless of distance.

FISTULA OF TEAT.—I have a valuable Jersey cow which has a fistula in one side of her teat close up to the udder, making it very disagreeable to milk, and much milk is wasted.

A.—When the cow is dry the fistulous tract can be done away with by cauterization or an operation by an expert surgeon. Until that can be done, apply flexible collodion twice daily, and if that does not succeed, apply a strip of surgeon's tape.

KITTEN SHEDDING TEXTH.—I have a kitten five months old, in the past two weeks has lost the two upper large teeth and two lower ones. Can you tell me if the kitten will have other teeth and the cause of the teeth falling out?

A.—Milk teeth have dropped out above and below and will in time be replaced by permanent ones. This is natural and starts about six months of age, as a general rule. Examine mouth now and then and remove the loose milk teeth with forceps. Apply listerine daily to the sore gums, or if a bad odor is noticed.

TUMOR.—I nave a mare, four years old, that has noticed.

TUMOR.—I nave a mare, four years old, that has a knot behind the shoulder blade that is as large as a pint cup. Sometimes it is hard and again it is soft. What do you think about it?

A.—A fibroid tumor no doubt is present and has come from bruising. The only successful treatment will be to have it cut out by a surgeon, then saturate oakum with a mixture of equal quantities of turpentine and raw linseed oil and pack into the wound daily until it is filled up; then apply oxide of zinc ointment once a day until it is healed.

TUMOR OF HAW.—I have a mule and his even are once a day until it is healed.

TUMOR OF HAW.—I have a mule and his eyes are affected. Some people say it is the hooks. The disease is cating the corners of his eyes out. They run matter fhat has an offensive odor. There seems to be a tumor, about the size of a man's little finger, under the eyelid.

A.—There is no such disease as the "hooks." The membrana nictitans or "third eyelid" has become infected and inflamed so that a tumor has formed. Have the tumor cut out by a surgeon. It is a very simple and successful operation.

ABSCESS.—I have a seven-year-old mare in fine con-and successful operation.

ABSCESS. -I have a seven-year-old mare in fine condition. In the winter her udder swells to twice its natural size. It gathers and discharges matter. It has been like this every winter since her last colt was weaned. Will this hinder her from raising colts? Can she be cured? If so, what remedy would you advise?

MRS. A. W. M.

A.—The udder is ruined for milk secretion, so that the mare should not be bred. Once daily, rub the udder with a mixture of one part of mercurial ointment and two parts of lard. If it opens and discharges, syringe out once daily with a one percent solution of permanganate of potash, and each other day inject a little tiacture of iodine.

WOUND.—I have a seven-year-old mare that cut her day inject a little tincture of iodine.

WOUND.—I have a seven-year-old mare that cut her left hind leg on a barb wire, about two inches below the hock, on the front part. It will not heal. The joint is not stiff. She can walk. Mas. M. B. H. A.—Wet the wound three times a day with a mixture of two ounces of sulphate of zinc, half an ounce of chloride of zinc, one dram of dilute hydrochloric acid and one pint of soft water. Label the bottle "poison" and shake it before using.

INTERED COLT.—I have a three years ald colt with acid and one pint of soft water. Label the bottle "poison" and shake it before using.

INJURED COLT.—I have a three-year-old colt with her left hind leg stiff and drawn up about three inches shorter than the other. The thigh seems to be drying up and a knot growing on the bock joint. The hoof is very small. She can throw her leg back and forward when she walks and tries to use it, but the leg is too short and stiff.

A.—Your description of the case indicates that the condition is hopeless, and unless an experienced graduate veterinarian decides to the contrary after a careful examination, the colt should be put out of her misery. Swelling.—I have a mule that bruised her hind leg just above the ankle joint. An abscess formed. I had it lanced and blistered by a veterinarian. The leg is enlarged and swells a little after a day's work. What can I do to reduce it to normal size, also make the hair grow where it was blistered. A. E. W.

A.—The treatment has been too severe and the hair will not grow back if the roots have been destroyed. Apply a little sweet oil and vaseline twice daily and bandage the leg with fiannel each time the mule comes into the stable. If possible, allow her a box stall.

CONTRACTED HOOP.—I have a fine, five-year-old colt in good condition, but his feet do not grow severed.

bandage the leg with fiannel each time the mule comes into the stable. If possible, allow her a box stall. Contracted Hoof.—I have a fine, five-year-old colt in good condition, but his feet do not grow as rapidly as they should. The hoof is sound, and the blacksmith said he could not find anything wrong. L. B. D. A.—For a month, keep cold, yet swabs of heavy felt or cotton waste upon the hoof-heads. Then clip off the hair, if the hoofs are not growing down normally, and blister twice a month with a mixture of two drams of biniodide of mercury and powdered cantharides and three ounces of lard. Rub the blister in for 15 minutes and then tie the horse up short so that he will be mable to lie down or bite the blistered parts. Wash the blister off in 48 hours and then apply a little lard daily. Do not repeat the blister before the skin has perfectly recovered from the previous blister.

PARALYSIS.—I have a hog that seems to be weak in her back and cannot stand on her hind legs. When I make her stand, the legs cross.

MRS. V. M.

A.—If the hog is in good flesh, we should advise you to kill it for meat. If you do not care to do this, give it a four-ounce dose of Epsom salts as a physic and then feed sloppy mashes containing raw linseed oil, and if they do not keep the bowels active, add Epsom salts daily. Constipation, confinement and overfeeding corn, commonly bring on paralysis.

The Girl He Loved

indiscretions or sorrows on some one else was against Levallion's creed.

"I have no favorite flower," she said, with a laugh, having crushed down the ghosts of flowers she loved and hated, "and—listen, Levallion, bend your head down, and—neither have any of them! They're racking their brains now to discover what their adorers prefer,"

"They will do, perfectly," said Ravenel, after one second. "They are very—appropriate. Sew them on firmly, Celeste, and make me a little wreath that will go under my hood."

An old tag of poetry had leaped into her memory as she looked at the white mass in the box, but she had no tremors lest any one else should remember and apply it.

She looked at herself narrowly in the glass when, after dinner, which, by the way, was anything but good, Levallion having had a fresh battle with Carrousel on the subject of the disappearance of the first orchids of the season—she achieved her toilet, and, with thankfulness, hid herself in her thick, black mask. For behind it she could let her mouth take what shape it liked; and, thank God! for one night need not be always smiling.

Levallion was late. He stood at one end of the long picture-gallery, where he had coolly banished all his ancestors as being too hideous to contemplate, and looked between the walls covered with modern French pictures to the far end of the room.

There were the guests in a group—and for a moment he was honestly puzzled, for the women were all of a height, as Mrs. Damerel had said.

Then he laughed, for he saw the duchess. And the duchess had taken Mrs. Damerel's words to heart and bedecked herself with real and veritable cauliflowers—but with what a genius.

On the white velvet gown were bestowed wreaths and bunches of the white part of her homely vegetable, which were almost as velvety as the gown itself.

She disdained either mask or hood, and her curled, gray-head rose over her ornaments with the air of a woman who may be fifty, but has slain a spiteful foe with her own weapon, and knows it.

"The blue one with forget-me-nots is Lady Chayter." Levallion looked again at the group. "Artificial! Artificial! I don't believe she ever knows it.

"The blue one with forget-me-nots is Lady Chayter." Levallion looked again at the group. "Artificial! Artificial! I don't believe she ever picked a real one in her life.

"Yellow and Marechal Niel roses—Mrs. Arbuthnot. That sweet vision of chiffon and lilies is Betty Beauchamp! Betty—who has a new young man every month in the year!" and he grinned. It was more amusing than such nonsense usually turned out. But from Lady Gwendolin Brook, in dull-orange and evil orchids, he turned his head in disgust, commenting, dryly, that she was too modern for future parties of his.

"I always stood up for her, too, which is awkhead in disgust, commenting, dryly, that she was too modern for future parties of his.

"I always stood up for her, too, which is awkward. But I never understood what she really ward. But I never understood what she really was, till I saw those devilish brown-spotted orchids," and his eyes found Mrs. Damerel and laughed. Shy and modest violets covered Mrs. Damerel's lilac satin, mistletoe having been unprocurable. Mrs. Damerel—who shot, and hunted, and smoked, and usually put her conversation into plain terms! She might put six masks on her face when she forgot not to stick out her self-asserting elbows. And then he looked no more, for his glance had fallen on a woman in white, standing alone at a little distance from the others. It was Ravenel, in a plain, ivory-satin gown, covered with great trails of white poppies with purplish-black hearts, and dull-green velvet leaves. Over a mass of the pallid flowers of sleep and death, her face and head were tragic in the black shroudings that he had somehow never thought looked sinister on the other women. And not her mask alone sent a chill to Levallion's heart. Her eyes, black and anxious in their narrow eyeholes, were fixed on Adrian Gordon, who for once stood beside her, was whispering in her ear.

And as he spoke her somber eyes flashed with a sudden brightness, a joy they never had for Levallion. "White popples!" even at his own expense, Levallion was cynical. "Well, I suppose I may a sudden brightness, a joy they never had for Levallion.

"White popples!" even at his own expense, Levallion was cynical. "Well, I suppose I may be glad she does not wear the roses of rapture and silence." And he cursed with some thoroughness himself for his suspicious thoughts and Hester Murray for her lying tales, even the innocent white popples, because they meant "oblivion"—the oblivion of a woman who says to herself every morning that she has forgotten. As he walked over to the duchess to congratulate her on her masterpiece of decoration, he felt exceedingly cross and out of sorts. But, being Lord Levallion, determined to keep his eyes and ears utterly away from his wife throughout the evening. Every girl has a school-day love-affair; let her bury hers tonight under her white popples! To spite himself and prove Hester was swrong, he haff half a mind to ask Adrian to stay on indefinitely, but even Levallion knew he could not do that.

"My dear Levallion," said the duchess, as the music—obtained by a miracle of money and a special train!—struck up, "pray don't wriggle! You're not sitting on a pin, are you?"

"It's Damerel," returned his lordship, affectedly. "Don't look at the egregious fool! He'll make you ill."

The duchess glanced at Mr. Damerel, who had turned his dress clothes into a walking funeral with tube-roses, even unto the seams of his trousers.

"He's very funny!" she said doubtfully.
"He ought to be put in.

"He's very funny!" she said doubtfully.

"He ought to be put in a hearse," snapped Levallion. "I wish I'd never read any poetry! I should not be able to remember so many quotations about the idiocy of man," but the particular verse, in his mind did not apply to Mr. Damerel's trousers, and he never glanced at his wife as she passed him, though her white train brushed his feet.

Slowly the words were putting themselves to-ether in his mind, and he knew more than tavenel did:

"Now, those are poppies in her locks, White poppies she must wear; Must wear a mask to hide her face And the want graven there."

Ravenel had gone no further; Levallion's vilely accurate memory supplied two lines more:

'Or—is the hunger, fed at length, Cast off the care?"

And at the memory of the quick and sudden glory of Ravenel's glance at Adrian, the man could not but wince. He looked up and saw her standing beside him.

"Aren't you going to dance with me?" she said. "You can't pretend you didn't know it was I, you know!"

Pretend, indeed, when he would know her in her grave-clothes with a cloth over her face! He rose a little stiffly and put his arms around her waist. He danced well for all his forty-seven years, and he knew it; the two floated smoothly down the long gallery to the tune of "Bid Me Good by and Go," and Adrian Gordon, who had never danced with the girl he woed, had to step back as she passed him in Levallion's arms.

Bureau of Information, Washington, D. C., for Uncle Sam's war pamphlets, and request him to read from these and explain to you all the big words you cannot understand. From these talks you will learn history, and if teacher unrolls a map of Europe, as an intelligent teacher should, and points you out the battle lines of the various nations involved in this great world struggle, you will also learn geography, and think more of your country and what it stands for. You will learn too, pity and sympathy for little children like yourselves, who have been starved, ouraged and butchered by inhuman devils without soul, compassion, conscience, honor or decency, who are tearing down not only all our forefathers came to this country to create and build, but are seeking to tear down the whole structure of civilization, so that they can grow fat on the toil of human slavery, and make all mankind bow the knee and pay tribute to a bunch of medieval robber barons who have no place in such a world as ours, and whose ideas, methods and bloodthirsty savagery would disgrace the dark ages. The war is knocking at every door and you children should know all about it. Then you can carry the truth home to your parents, many of whose minds have been poisoned by our enemies and who are ready to excuse every vile act because of a perverted and misplaced affection for their father or motherlands or the lands of their ancestors. This war may last for years and you who are children now may be involved in it, so you see how necessary it is to know what it is all about. I hope after teacher divides you up for your spelling contest that he puts you to gether again. You would have an awful bad spell if he didn't.

MINOT, NORTH DAKOTA.

MINOT, NORTH DAKOTA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I live in Minot, North Dakota. I am a girl of nine years, and I can do many things. I can crochet and can tatt. I can bake cakes. My mother has joined the food pledge. She makes corn, and graham bread and cottage cheese. We have meat about once in two weeks. We eat quite lots of salmon. Papa is going to kill some hogs pretty soon, and then we can have meat once a day. My mother and father both belong to the Red Cross. My father has a war bond. My father has a Ford car. I like to ride in our car. It is fun I think. There are nine in our family. I have two brothers and four sisters. One of my sisters is sickly. I hope to see my letter in print.

Ida, I'm delighted to hear from you and to get in touch with the Van Fleet family. Three cheers for every one of you. The Van Fleet family is doing its level best to win this war and to keep Uncle Sam instead of the Kaiser from running, this country. Ida's mama has "joined the food pledge" as she quaintly puts it. Signed the food pledge would be a more correct way of expressing it. A lot of people would not help our country even to the extent of signing that pledge, a lot who have signed it are not living up to it. It has got to be lived up to however, if we are to win this war. A very wrathy German lady wrote me that the saving of food should begin at the President's table. It has begun there and it will continue there. Your mother is wise, Irene, putting you on a diet of salmon for there is nothing better or more nutritious and appetizing. Billy the Goat makes the most delicious fish cakes of shredded codfish and potatoes, and we use these as our chief meal twice a week. We use war-bread only at breakfast and supper. Potatoes are plentiful and wheat is scarce. Papa is lucky to have hogs for table use. The hogs that I want to kill are all two legged and would make mighty poor eating. Irene, let me congratulate your family on belonging to the Red Cross and possessing a war bond. Everyone should belong to the Red Cross. It only costs a dollar a year and no matter whether in peace or war, in all corners of the earth it is doing Christ's work. It was the first to rush aid to the stricken city of Halifax and wherever disasters are to be met, the wounded and afflicted to be succored, plague, war or pestilence, famine and flood to be fought, the Red Cross is there. On the battleids of France the Allies have 60,000 ambulances. Poor Russia had only 6,000 and most of these were supplied by the good Red Cross people of America. Imagine what suffering those poor souls endured for the lark of sufficient ambulances, dressing stations, hospitals and medical care. Yes, Ida, I understand it's lots of fun riding in a Ford car—b

ALLENTOWN, R. R. 2, PA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a girl fifteen years old, five feet six inches tall, gray eyes and brown hair. I go to school every day. Now here is what I want to ask you Uncle Charlie. Do you think it right for me to go with a soldier when my mother is against it, my father also. I love him and he said he loved me. I live on a farm about a mile from the car line. We have two horses, two cows and a lot of chickens, ducks, dogs and one goose. I wish you could have been with us last Thanksgiving, and have had a piece of the goose. I hope Billy the Goat don't get this.

and have had a piece of the goose. I hope Billy the Goat don't get this. Your niece, ESTHER COPE.

For the next few years young lady, you take father's and mother's advice. They are older than you and have had infinitely more experience. Their love for you is the real thing, while soldier boy does not know any more what real love is than you do, and probably your parents know something about the soldier boy that you don't. Puppy love is like measles. It is all right if you pull through and death when you don't. Most of us go through it and if the old folks are watchful and the girl is not an utter fool and the boy a villain, no harm comes of it, and in after life we can look back at our puppy loves and yell and think what idiots we made of ourselves. When you are a woman you'll say: "Thank God my folks did not let me marry that nut of a boy so and so." And your man John will say: "Thank heaven my folks steered me away from that crack-brained, gabby, old, pie-faced Susan Smith." Go and play with your dolls Esther, and above all go and ponder over your books and educate your brain and build up your character, and develop your personality and leave your heart and emotions alone until you have acquired sense, wisdom and ability to know a man who loves you from a boy who is only jollying you. Don't rush things, take your time and heed what father and mother say. The girls who fill our potters' fields, the nameless and the shameless dead, always utter these words before death mercifully closes their eyes and seals their lips: "Oh, how different it all would have been if I had only taken father's and mother's advice!"

Always glad to hear from cowboys Jack, and believe me' if I could send the peace-at-any-price bugs and hand them over to Mr. Villa or turn them over to the Kaiser's Potsdam gang, I would love to do it. They know how to fix these white feather lunatics. Some of these people write and tell me that when we are smitten on one cheek. Christ said we should turn the other. I mentioned that to one of the greatest, most devout, saintly and scholarly ministers in this country the other day, a man many of you know by name, for he lectures all over the country. He told me to tell you that we had not only turned the other cheek to be smitten, but that we had turned out backs to be kicked, and we've not only been hammered all over the body but we've been murdered and slaughtered as well. It is quite true that the Bible says "Thou Shalt Not Kill," but so no peace-at-any-price fanatic ever had an atom of sense, it logically follows that he imagines God is devoid of sense as he is. God meant that we were not to commit murder, not to wantonly and willfully take life. He did not say that we were to quietly lie down and let anybody murder us without offering resistance. Here's one for the peace fanatics to stew over: "And the Lord said thou shalt make no peace with the wicked." Wasn't it God who stopped the sun so as to give Joshua an opportunity to go on fighting and killing? It takes all sorts of people to make up a queer world like this, Jack, and somebody has to fill the lunatic asylums, so let the peace-at-any-price rainbow chasers go ahead, we have plenty of padded cells ready for them. I'm sorry we can't come down and assist you at the round up. With steak at forty dollars an inch those poor cows of yours would have some anxious moments if the whole crowd of us got headed for the Sweadon ranch. You say you have twenty head of cows, and your brand is AX., and you hope to have "quiet" a few brands? Jack, no

Crying Infant Doll Premium No. 7284

You simply press it gently in the back and the wonderful voice responds instantly. The vocal mechanism by which this doll imitates a baby's cry completely fills its chubby body. The marvelous contrivance is thoroughly made and its articulation of "Mamm" is surprising, not to say bewildering to those who hear it. Including dress and all this little infant measures 14 inches in length. The pretty white infant's dress and hood is trimmed with lace and handsome blue silk ribbon bows. She has blue eyes and a cute baby curl peeps out from beneath the hood in a truly life-like manner. This doll is unbreakable, the head being made of a special indestructible composition of a natural fleshlike color. No matter how many dolls the children now have, they will surely be delighted with this one and every

If You Are A Woman Who Loves Crochet And Tatting Here Is A Set Of Books You Will Be Delighted To Own!

ANY ONE of these books alone is a veritable treasure house of the newest, most beautiful designs. The seven books combined form a complete library in which you will find any pattern in crocheting and tatting you could possibly ask for. You will fairly revel in the many handsome designs shown. There are edgings, beadings, insertions and laces for every conceivable use. The illustrations are metual photographs of the finished work and show every thread so plainly that they are almost as good to work from as the directions themselves. The directions are adapted for either beginner or expert. They tell attich by attich how each pattern is worked, also the quantity and size of material required and the correct sizes of hooks to be used. Following is a description of each book. They are 8 by 10 1-2 inches in size with the exception of Volume I which is 9 1-4 by 12 inches. Please order by numbers.

Volume 2 Handsome crocheted edgings and insertions suitable for handkerchiefs, underwear, dresses and a multitude of other uses,—thirty-three different designs.

Volume 3 Eighteen lovely designs in Cluny insertions and laces for center-pieces, library scarfs, boudoir caps, corset cover yokes, piano scarfs, curtains, chemisés, envelopes or combination suits.

Volume 4 Twenty-five handsome designs in artistic crochet for yokes, boudoir caps, candle shades, baby bonnets, bedspreads, dollies, library scarfs, pillows, centerpieces, portiere, medallions, curtains, etc., etc.

Volume 5 Twenty-five designs in novelty crochet, including mile-a-minute and clover leaf crocheted yokes, primrose and sunflower yokes; dollies, centerpieces, boudoir caps unique edges and insertions for serving trays; novelty aprons and collars.

Volume 6 Thirty-two designs in tatting, Maltese and Irish crochet,—a varied assortment of tatted handkerchief edges, edgings and insertions, tatted yokes, boudoir eages, eagings and insertions, tatted yokes, bouddir caps, towel edges, medallions; yokes, breakfast caps, centerpieces, edgings and lace in Maltese crochet and yokes in Irish crochet.

Volume 7 Thirty handsome novelty crocheted designs including rose, sunflower periwinkle, and Venetian yokes; boudoir caps, monsety face dibrary scarf, and lace pillow; large and small baskets, hat pin holder, jewel box, vanity tray coin purse, utility bag, starfish doily, pincapple centerpiece; edgings and insertions in pillow lace; daisy edging; spider, bell, rick-rack, novelty and coronation braid laces.

WE advise you to order all seven of these splendid books before the assortment is broken. If however you do not care for the whole library at this time we have arranged the following special offers which give you the opportunity to secure any two or any four or the entire seven books. When ordering please be very careful to state the number of each book desired.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

A. K., Munson, Pa.—If the abscesses of or on knee have been opened and are discharging, wash to out with a solution of Javelle water, using one to spoonful of the Javelle water to a glass of water.

of with a solution of savene water, using one tearspoonful of the Javelle water to a glass of water.

Mrs. L. S., Sumner, Ga.—There is no receipt for, dieting suitable and useful in every case. Each case is a law unto itself, and must be treated from an individual standpoint. In other words, the personal equation comes in, and also the personal idiosyncracy must be consuited. In general, skimmed milk is beneficial to an irritable stomachic condition, or some modification of milk, such as Koumyss—fermented milk—or even ordinary buttermilk will in many cases be acceptable and beneficial. Then again peptonized milk is indicated. You might also try junket. As you have a cough, you should carefully look into the cause of the cough, and if possible stop the cough with suitable remedies. In the meantime try some of the milk modified as above indicated, and report again. again.

Mrs. F. S., Bridgeport, Conn.—Folliculer stomatitis, or ordinary "canker" sores, are usually due to some disorder of digestion or uncleanness, especially in the care of the teeth, etc. The local application of silver nitrate one per cent. solution, mel boracis—borax and honey—and some such mouth-wash as Dobell's solution will usually cure a given case.

Mrs. E. B. M., Buffalo Gap, S. D.—Would not advise the use of any reducing measure while you are nursing your baby. You probably mean to use a medical formula given in a bath. Epsom saits in pound quantities put in a bath will reduce your weight. It must be used with caution, as it often affects the heart.

Mrs. E. G., Rupert, Idaho.—A one per cent. solution of resorcin in alcohol and rose water applied twice a week sparingly will, in many cases, stop the falling out of the hair.

Hemorrhoids, or piles, are the usual cause of bleeding from the rectum. There are other conditions that may cause bleeding, such as malignant disease, polypi, ulcerations of the mucous membranes, presence of a foreign body, etc. Your pain in the region of the navel, and the gas in the bowels, are due, no doubt, to some secondary indigestion. Try a skimmed milk diet for a week, with proper correction of the bowels, using some mild cathartic.

Mrs. Annie J., Roslyn, Wash.—Some aromatic cas-cara mixture for your bowels, and a diet that contains some form of bran, would help, if not cure, your chronic constipation. Also drink plenty of good water between your meals, either hot or cold. Avoid strong coffee or tea. A simple diet of strained oatmeal por-ridge, plain skimmed milk, toast and fresh fruit might be added.

Mrs. M. P., Netty, Ky.—Your history as given would indicate the cause of your breakdown. Caring for four children, marriage at the age of fourteen, and doing your own work, would be sufficient to cause a nervous, if not a physical, wreck. You should have a good vacation, away from your family, where you can have a chance to recuperate. The boy's lumps mentioned are no doubt of strumous origin and he should have some good iron tonic prescribed for the same by your local doctor.

S. A. Dexter, Ga.—Evergraph tablets of saliculate.

S. A., Dexter, Ga.—Five-grain tablets of salicylate of sods, one taken three times a day after meals, will help your rheumatism. You should go to Atlanta, Ga., and have your eyes examined by an eye specialist there. Comport does not recommend or give names of specialists in any line.

F. K., Waverly, Va.—Carbolic acid burns, as a rule, are very superficial and do not cause a permanent scar.

Miss M. W., Adrian, Minn.—You must have your eyes carefully examined, under a mydriatic, by a competent specialist. From what you write, it would seem that your condition is more likely to be due to eye strain than anything else. The ordinary examination, done by some local jeweler, will not do and in most cases is a poor makeshift for a real examination. Try this, and report further, if not relieved.

Mrs. L. S., Gallon, Ohio.—Some malt drink, such as the so-called Best Tonic or mait extract, is indicated, and will do all that can be done to help you nurse your child. Of course, drinking milk and good, nourishing food must also be taken.

Mrs. A. C. L.. Rockham, S. D.—Use Lassar's paste

nurse your child. Of course, drinking milk and good, nourishing food must also be taken.

Mrs. A. C. L., Rockham, S. D.—Use Lassar's paste diluted with vaseline,—using ten parts of vaseline to one part of the paste. See, also, that your child does not eat indigestible food, or foods that are literally steeped in sugar. Pastry, capdies and highly seasoned foods must be omitted from the child's diet absolutely, if you wish for results in cases of this kind.

Mrs. D. P., Fernwood, Idaho.—There seems to be only one remedy for you, and that is a change of climate. Your pleurodynia is probably of malarial origin. Large doses of quinine sometimes will effect a cure, but a change of climate is the one best guess in your case. Your husband undoubtedly has a high blood pressure, and his urticaria is also due to the same cause that makes for high blood pressure. Some good cathartic, light meals, and drinking plenty of good spring water, should effect a cure in his case.

Mrs. M. W. B., Talbert, Texas.—Your numbness in the finger-tips is due, no doubt, to some neurosis, and may also have some connection with your age. Massage at night, with a cold sponge douche to the spine, should help you.

L. D., Alto, Ga.—Go to some good eye specialist and have some connections with states.

L. D., Alto, Ga.—Go to some good eye specialist and ave your eyes examined for glasses.

H. M., Oil Center, Ky.—You should have an operation for the falling of the womb, and all the tissues put in their normal condition. The spinal douche is as follows: Standing in the bath-tub, let the hot water run until it just covers your feet, then let the cold water from the bath-spray run down the spine for two or three minutes. Follow this with a brisk rub, using a large, coarse bath towel for the purwo or three minutes. Follow this with a brisk using a large, coarse bath towel for the pur-

A. K., 649 E. 223rd Street, N. Y. C.—The so-called Dobell's solution, which can be purchased at any drug store, is a good mouth wash. This, however, will not take the place of a good dentrifice for the teeth.

Mrs. I. M. Casey, Ill.—Suppression of the periods for a more or less extended time, after confinement, may be due to a run-down physical condition, and may be due to malaria. Both require tonics and proper treatment along some medical line.

Mrs. R. L. M.—"Bed-wetting" is frequently due to adenoids, lack of circumcision, or some remote irritation of stomachic origin. If your children have been circumcised and have had their adenoids removed, try a light meal at night, and, if possible, see that the child passes his water during the night in the usual way, and not involuntarily, by arousing him at a stated time.

D. M., Dairs City, Ia.—The thyroid gland has a direct connection with growth and nutrition. It, however, must be taken only on the order of a physician, and its action must be carefully watched.

Miss E. E. E., Lynden, Wash.—On retiring, use the cold spinal douche so often described in Comfort. This, combined with a general massage, will probably help your condition. For the body odor, you can use the following: Two teaspoonfuls of salicylate of soda to a pint of water. Bathe the parts with this lotion once a day.

once a day.

Mrs. M. C., Ludlow, Ky.—You are suffering from too much introspection. Many of your complaints are of your own imagination. You should go out-of-doors more. Take up some work that will cause you to meet other people and get rid of your many misgivings as to your health and relations to other people. It is of course impossible to get at the exact condition, but it is most probably, as before hinted at, purely personal and imaginative. Follow your physician's advice solely, and stop or curb your many and varied imaginings.

would like to adopt a child. I advise them to do so because the poor little orphans are hungry for a mother's love and for a home. I am so thankful that I have a home, and parents to love me.

Our farm is called "The Fairview Farm" and we can see the nearest town, Ironwood, two and one half miles from here, very plainly.

I am in the Freshman class in high school and enjoy it. I hope to be a teacher some day. Mamma and Papa are doing all they can to get me through school and I hope to repay them. I am taking algebra, English, general science and German this year and I will take Latin the last two years. Almost all of us are doing Red Cross work at school. The girls are busy with needles and yarn, making warm garments for our boys in the Army and Navy. The boys are also knitting and do better than some of the girls. We are going to organize a Junior Red Cross soon and help keep the Boys comfortable.

I enjoy farm work such as milking and taking care of the cows, and driving a team. We have seven head of cattle but our herd is young.

I like to crochet and knit and would be glad to receive patterns. I am not much use at home when I go to school because I get home so late in the evening and have to leave at seven o'clock in the morning. I live about three miles from school nad as I do not like to stay in town I walk five or six miles every day.

do not like to stay in town I walk five or six miles every day.

I'll be fifteen years old the 28th day of April. I am large for my age, five feet, three inches tall and quite stout. Have dark blue eyes, brown hair and am sunburnt and freckles dot my nose.

I would like to receive letters from the COMPORT sisters, especially those near my own age, and will try to answer.

Your COMPORT sister, HULDA JOHNSON.

Hulda.—You are a girl after my own heart and your letter was very interesting. Tell us more about your Junior Red Cross. I think it is a splendid thing for you to do.

ROSCOMMON, MICH.

MRS. WILKINSON:

Will you allow me space for this letter? I suppose that when I asked for information about small farms in Virginia I should have said farms of from ten to thirty acres and up from the coast. I am deluged with letters, not only from Virginia, but all other states. I have answered those that might do but it would keep me busy if I should try to answer all, so those who wrote to me and received no answer, please accept my thanks and the assurance that the land offered was not what was desired. With my weak fungs, I must find a home in or near the mountains. Another thing, when I asked for reading I expressed a desire that no religious papers be sent but up to the present time, all that I have received have been of that kind, religious papers and tracts, which is a waste of postage. I would, however, appreciate magazines devoted to the culture of flowers and fruits. I take Park's Floral World but there must be others printed on the care of flowers. Any good reading will be acceptable.

Again thanking one and all, I remain,
A COMFORT Sister,
MRS. E. A. DOYLE.

Mrs. Doyle.—It looks as though you had to take religious papers, directly or indirectly, whether you wish to or not; if you receive magazines relating to the care and culture of flowers, for Henry Ward Beecher said, "Flowers are sent to do God's work in unrevealed paths, and to diffuse influence by channels that we hardly suspect,"—then the flowers you cultivate not only enrich your own life but the lives of those who enjoy them with you. Christina G. Rossetti tells us too that "Flowers preach to us if we will but hear."—Ed.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around The Home

To sour milk, add a few drops of vinegar.

Rub a curtain pole with hard soap and the draperies will slip more easily.

Liquid ammonia will remove sewing machine oil stains from garments.

Powdered starch applied instantly to fruit stains will often remove them.

To remove mildew, soak the clothes in a solution of chloride of lime water. To clean lamp burners, wash them in a strong solu-tion of wood ashes and water.

Add a teaspoonful of water to the white of an egg and it will make it whip more quickly.

Put left-over toast into a glass jar and screw lid n tightly and it will keep fresh for hours.

To remove grease from wall paper, rub the spot with a piece of fiannel dampened in alcohol. When flower stems are too short for the vase you wish to use, fill the vase to desired height with wads of paper.

Wash your white silk gloves and stockings in cold water and dry them in the shade and you will find they will not turn yellow.

To remove paint from clothing, saturate the spot several times with equal parts of ammonia and turpentine, and then wash in warm soapsuds.

If a cake sticks when taking it from the baking tin, place it on a cloth wrung out of hot water and let it stand a few minutes. It will then come out without any trouble.

Thirty Minutes is a short time, but many have earned one of these watches in less time than that. It is one of the very best watches for time ever offered to our readers, no matter what the price asked for it. We know, of course, there are watches that cost more money, because they are in gold or silver cases, but for practical everyday use they are no better timekeepers. This watch does not keep perfect time, we never saw the watch that did, but it keeps as near perfect time as watches usually do. We have such faith in this watch as a timekeeper that we send with every one a guarantee just as binding as that given with any watch, no matter what make. We are willing to give you this watch if you will do us a slight service, which you can easily do in an hour. We wish to increase our subscription list, and we want the assistance of every reader of this paper to that end. We do not want you to do it for nothing, we will reward you for it. Sibyl's Influence and be fitted to assume the very highest position possible.

She acquired a brilliant education, being determined to make the most of her opportunities, and be fitted to assume the very highest position possible.

She made a great sensation in the world when she was introduced, and reigned a belle for a number of seasons; and, while the countess could not fail to be proud of her in a certain way, yet she missed the love which her childless heart was forever reaching out after.

And thus Ada Therwin grew to womanhood—beautiful, accomplished, and with powers of fascination which few women in the world possess. Yet there was not one particle of good in her heart, though she often deceived people, as she was now striving to deceive Sibyl, into the belief that she was an angel of light.

She won hearts by the score, only to trample on them when they became her captives, and laugh over the conquests she had made; and she had never yet met the man to whom she could yield her will in a single point, or who could satisfy her ambition for position in the world. She had begun to tire somewhat of London society and her conquests there, when the invitation came from her friend, Mrs. Maplewood, for her to spend the winter with her in Dumfries; and, upon her acceptance, they put forth every effort to make the season a brilliant one for her.

Thus it happened that Miss Ada Therwin, among other acquaintances, made that of Lady Prescott's beautiful ward, and, for reasons to be hereafter explained, became her bitterest and most implacable foe.

Toward Raymond Prescott she was instantly

Implacable foe.

Toward Raymond Prescott she was instantly and strangely attracted.

His grand figure, his high-bred face, his polished manner, together with the glare of his prospective fortune—for Miss Therwin was greedy, even as Judith had said—all seemed to have a peculiar charm for her.

Perhaps this may have been caused somewhat by Raymond's apparent indifference to her usually all-conquering charms, and his evident admiration of his mother's protegee, and thus all the antagonism of her nature was aroused to arms.

Be that as it may, she now bent all the powers of her strong will to the accomplishment of a twofold object—the ruin, utter and entire, of Sibyl, and the winning of the proud and handsome Raymond Prescott.

Sibyl had been profuse in her praises of Miss Therwin, and of the good she was doing so unobtrustively (?) upon her return from her very enjoyable drive; so much so, indeed, as to occasion the surprise of Lady Prescott, for the young girl was usually very reticent, and exceedingly shy of making intimate acquaintances.

Nevertheless, her ladyship was also very favorably impressed with her account of the beautiful stranger's goodness and charity, while she could but acknowledge her superior attractions, both of body and mind.

"I never knew any one to take your heart by storm before," Sibyl; did you, Raymond?" playstorm before, Sibyl; did you, Raymond?" playstorm defore, Sibyl; did you, Ra

"I never knew any one to take your heart by storm before, Sibyl; did you, Raymond?" playfully remarked Lady Prescott, as they sat at the tea table after Sibyl's return.

"Yes, I think I do remember one instance of that kind, previous to this," he returned, smiltingly that kind, previous to this," he returned, smilingly.

Sibyl looked up in surprise, and colored deepest crimson as she met his admiring eyes.

"When was that?" demanded his mother.

"When? Your memory is not as good as mine, it seems. It was when my irresistible mother made a like conquest about six years ago," he replied, his eyes still reading the flushed and somewhat troubled face.

"I think the conquest was the other way, Ray—Sibyl took me by storm, and has held the fort ever since," Lady Prescott answered with a happy laugh, and a fond look at her lovely captor.

Sibyl heaved a sigh of relief.

Raymond had not then discovered, nor intended to cast any reflections upon her regard for him.

"It has been a very delightful fort to hold, auntie, and I trust I shall never be so unfortunate as to lose possession of it," she replied, with a bright look, and carrying out their figure.

"It would be a sad day for me if you should ever vacate it," laughed her ladyship, while a little thrill of sadness pervaded her heart, as she

P. C., Michigan.—We think the man who married a second time with a wife living from whom he was not divorced, was guilty of bigamy; we do not think the woman, who was the victim of his second marriage, was guilty of bigamy; we think she should have that marriage legally annulled, before marrying again.

Mrs. J. A. G., Nebraska.—Under the laws of Kentucky, we are of the opinion that if your mother left no will, her real estate descended, upon her death, in equal shares to her children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share, subject to the surviving husband's right to a one third interest for life; we do not think the heirs at law need any deed to their interest in the property, as they become entitled to their interest in the property by operation of law; we think they should proceed to exercise acts of ownership.

entitled to their interest in the property by operation of law; we think they should proceed to exercise acts of ownership.

J. S. H., Missouri.—We do not think a clause in a long-term note providing that unpaid annual interest thereon shall be added to and become part of the principal of the note and bear a like rate of interest, would subject the owner of such note to the penalty of not being able to enforce immediate payment of such interest when the same becomes due.

Miss S. J., Alabama.—Your statements are too indefinite for us to form any opinion as to just where the governing power of the Union Church you mention is vested but we think it safe to assume that no one person has any legal right to dictate and exercise ownexhip rights over the property, simply because he volunteered and performed some service in connection with the building of the church.

Mrs. E. C. M., Pennsylvania.—We think the courts of your state have power to compel a husband to support his wife living separate from him in case she has been compelled to leave him because of his cruel and inhuman treatment of her.

Mrs. I. M. F., Indiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that in the absence of a will, the rights of a widow against children and the husband's relatives are as follows: To five hundred dollars in goods or money and in addition, thereto the following: If two or more children survive the husband, the wife takes one third of the real and personal estate absolutely; if one child survives, the widow takes one half absolutely, provided, however, that if all the children surviving are children by a former wife, the children are the "forced heirs" of the widow, i. e., the widow cannot alienate her interest so as to prevent these children from inheriting it from her; and provided, further that real estate descending to a widow is rendered inalienable during her life by her remarrying while any of the children or descendants, when of full age, join in the deed. A. A., Michigan.—We think it would be better for you to settle your dispute with your aunt as to the amount due for your services and advancement for her support and maintenance, during her lifetime; we do not think such a claim is as easily proved against an estate as during the lifetime of the person who received the benefit.

L. M. K., Colorado.—We think, as a general rule, it would be very bad judgment to make a contract to buy property if you have no money with which to make the first payment on account. We think you will encounter enough difficulty in meeting installment payments as they become due, even when you have your plans laid to meet them, without making a contract to make payments for which no provision is made in advance.

tract to make payments for which no provision is made in advance.

E. N., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a stepchild has no rights of inheritance from the stepfather's estate, unless some provision is made for the stepchild by will, except, of course, that in case the child's mother survives the stepfather and receives a share of her husband's estate, her child would upon her death receive a child's share from her estate.

Mrs. J. H. Y., Washington.—We do not think you can compel your neighbor to cut his shade tree if the same stands entirely upon his own property. We think, however, you can compel him to trim same so that the branches do not extend over your property.

Mrs. M. B. F., Ridgefield Park, N. J.—Upon your statements, we think that if the roof of the house you own extends over your neighbor's property, your neighbor is entitled to have that portion of the roof extending over his property removed. Just what your rights are in any claim for damages you may have against the company which sold you the house, we think depends upon matters not stated in your communication. We think you should have had this property surveyed at the time of your purchase and rejected title if the house did not stand entirely upon the property pprchased by you.

Mrs. L. W., Shelburn, Ind.—We think that all claims for Eventive from the death the second of the same and rejected title if the house did not stand entirely upon the property purchased by you.

Mrs. L. W., Shelburn, Ind.—We think that all claims for exemption from the draft law on the grounds of dependents were questions for the local exemption boards and that if the case of the young man you mention has been passed upon by such exemption board, it will be difficult now to obtain any different ruling in his case.

Sibyl innocently thought she did not need to take any oath of allegiance; she could never be other than true to her heart's core. How could she help bowing in homage before a man like Raymond Prescott, or fondly loving a woman like his mother?

When in his presence, except for her varying courteous.

At first he was deeply hurt by this reserve and lack of freedom, and set himself to study her, and if possible discover the reason of it. Her concession on the night of the birthday reception, in dropping the word "cousin," and calling him simply "Ray" had, he thought, been a great gain.

Still there seemed to be a barrier which he could not break through; and, as he became more and more interested in her, and found that she was to be the one woman in the world whom he could not break through; and, as he became more and home, it troubled him exceedingly.

"It is evident that she does not regard me in the light of a brother, nor yet as a cousin, else she would avoid me. Sibyl's heart bounded, and the ever-ready color leaped to her checks at his words.

He had said "my" princess this morning, having never before prefixed the pronoun, while the emphasis on his last words implied that he felt somewhat hurt at her reserve.

"Surely you cannot think that I have premeditated any unfairness toward you. I do not deem my opinion of any moment to you," she said a trile uneasily."

"I suppose it is because I feel my own littleness, and your magnitude." she answered, striving to speak lightly. "Mentally, I meant," she added, in the next breath, and with a laugh, straightening up, for she was nearly as tall as he was now.

He smiled, while he could not help the look of admiration which he bent upon her, she was so beautiful in her modest confusion before him. Then suddenly facing her, he laid his shapely hands on her shoulders, and said, gently:

The beautiful color came and went in her cheek; a thrill ran through every fiber of herbeing at his touch, and the white lids quivered over the drooping eyes, as if pride and timidity were each struggling for the mastery.

FUN, fun, fun—that's what you'll have when you get this wonderful new toy town, with its streets, yards, houses, stores, shops and men, women and children, just like any real town. Only think! Twenty-five different buildings—and you can build them, take them down and build them again as often as you please. You can call it "your own town" and talk to the people living in the streets and working in the shops—the blacksmith at his forge in the blacksmith shop, the children going to school, the customers in the stores and hotel and even the little boys and girls playing "indian" and "soldier" in the dandy big tent on the bank of the beautiful river that flows under the bridge. Remember—twenty-five buildings make quites big town—bigger than some real towns we know of.

In this wonderful toy town village there are thirteen handsome up-to-date houses, a tent, church, high school savings bank, hotel, clubhouse, barber shop, bakery, blacksmith shop, express office, garage and pulice station, besides all the streets, yards and flowers, river and bridge. They are made of thick heavy cardboard printed in natural colors so that they look like real houses while the streets, yards and flowers are colored true to liffe. Full directions tell you how to put all the different buildings together, how to lay out your town and place the houses on the streets. When the houses are all up your town will measure nearly three square feet in size.

We will give you this wonderful toy town complete as described above on the terms of the following special

Two Wheel Chairs in February 451 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The continued severe winter weather has cut the wheel-chair subscriptions the past month much below the usual number so that only two wheel chairs can be awarded for February

The two February wheel chairs go to Mrs. Mary Olsen, R. 2, Box 39. Bagley Minn. 109; Hazel Hunnicutt R 2, Box 67. Hurdle Mill, N C. 106. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them Mrs. Mary Olsen, age 44 has long been paralyzed in her lower limbs due to injury to her spine caused by falling down-stairs eighteen years ago She has a husband and children, and the wheel chair will be a great help to them in caring for her as well as a source of much comfort to her.

Hazel Hunnicutt, a little girl of eight years has suffered much from white swelling of the knee joint due to an injury caused by an unfortunate jump from the barn loft. She has not been able to walk since

I hold to the hope, as expressed last month, that with the opening of spring and the advent of more favorable weather the wheel-chair subscriptions will again come in the usual numbers, or better to make up for the winter deficiency. Busy as probably you are with Red Cross work, don't forget and don't neglect to do something to help the poor, suffering shut ins to obtain the COMFORT wheel chairs they are so much in need of.

A few letters of thanks and the month's Roll of Honor follows

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 25 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL.CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shat-in and pay the treight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little taster each mostly than you do yours. Any shut-in who has friends to help him get subscriptions can obtain a wheel chair free. Write me for information.

Pleased and Grateful for Her Wheel Chair

SODA SPRINGS, IDAHO. .

EDITOR COMFORT,
DEAR FRIEND:
I have received my Comfort wheel chair, and it is double dear to me, because I have a little sick granddaughter now and I share the use of it with her. I am so pleased with it that words or pen cannot express my gratitude to you and my friends for helping me to get it. My daughter is a widow with five little girls and my boy is in the army. Thanking you all, I remain, lovingly.

ADELLA ALBISTON.

Her Wheel Chair a Comfort to Her

FORT WHITE, FLORIDA.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

The wheel chair has come and I am much pleased with it. It surely is a comfort to me as I have been confined to my bed. I thank you and all kind friends who helped me to get it. Yours very truly,

CATHERINE FRAISCRE. DEAR MR. GANNETT:

Very MuchiPleased with COMFORT Wheel Chair

ROCKWOOD, TENN.

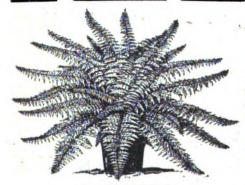

DEAR MR. GANNETT:
I received my wheel chair all right and am very much pleased with it. I wish to thank you and my friends who helped me get the chair which is a great pleasure Your grateful little friend, SANFORD SHELINGS.

We say this to let you know that there is but small chance of your story finding its way into print. But try it first on some of your local papers. Mrs. S. M. A., Kamiah, Ida.—Here is another Comfort reader with a violin containing an interior inscription which makes her think it is a genuine Stradivarius. As we have stated before, it would have been impossible for old Antonius Stradivarius to have made all the violins that are cheerfully attributed to him by dealers who have something to sell and use a faked inscription to sell it. Experts differ as to the exact number of genuine Strads in existence today, but all agree that they are very few in number. There are about thirty well-antenticated instruments. painting over the outside of your brick house in the place where dampness comes through would remedy the difficulty. We have known of this condition in many brick houses, and it is generally caused by the plastering having been done directly on the surface of the brick wall. We suggest that you have some furring strips nailed upon the wall of the room where this dampness occurs, and then place wallboard over this furring in such a manner that there is a dead air space left of an inch or more. Now paper upon the wallboard, and you will be safe from the dampness for all time. Lath and plaster could be used instead of wallboard, if preferred, but the latter would be cheaper, and easier to put on.

"Oh, very well: I'll send the medicine right around." And after careful instructions and a promise to run in each morning to make Noble comfortable for the day, the doctor left Cecily alone with her patient.

Followed days of amazing inspiration for her. To be sure Noble required much of her, time, but there were still many moments to be snatched for her work and it made no difference to her whether they were by night or by day.

She gave up, for a time, her study with de Lille. She dragged an idle easel into the best light and bought recklessly of materials, experimenting with brush and crayon.

Her brain cells were clogged with undigested impressions. Everything which she had read—and it was much—every work of art which she had seen—and since coming to New York she had seen—and since coming to New York she had seen—and since coming to New York she had seen—and since towning her impressions into sequence.

Her Latin spirit aftre, she worked like a war horse and during the doctor's visits, which were her periods for exercise, she rounded up odd specimens of the alien races near the Square, bringing them home with her for sittings.

More than anything else, Noble's friends annoyed her. They were forever dropping in to enquire for his progress—the doctor forbade them seeing him—and she could see that they were curious about her. That she vastly amused them, she was too self-absorbed to see. While the unconventionality of the situation was a matter of complete indifference to them, Noble's departure from a hitherto unimpeachable judgment surprised them. In her gingham smock she did not fit into the picture.

Leah Belloc came nearly every day and she did not take at all kindly to Cecily's presence in the studio.

Slie was a tall, willowy girl, with reddish hair and curious green eyes. She did daring nosters, some of which Cecily remembered to have seen in an art store window.

Thoughtlessly, foolishly recklessly, Cecily has drifted into a position that has destroyed her reputation, though she is as yet sinless. What will happen when Noble recovers his health? Her character is wavering on the verge of the precipice. With her reputation gone will her character descend to the depths? Her troubles are further complicated by the jealous hatred of a cunning and unscrupulous woman, Leah Belloc, but the climax is reached when Noble's angry father asserts his authority.

These Roses Will Bloom And Bloom All Summer!

Mrs. Folly Hobbs

Etoile De Lyon

THIS is a deep golden yellow rose, marvelously rich and pure, with an exquisite fragrance. The blossoms are beautifully formed, large, full and double and of splendid substance—the texture being very thick and lasting. It is an unusually strong grower, quickly forming a stout hardy bush and producing a profusion of glorious flowers on long stems all summer. Grace of form, charm of color and vigor of growth are three characteristics which make this one of the finest roses ever offered.

ONE of the finest climbing roses ever grown, producing a perfect riot of bloom in large clusters of a beautiful bright cherry pink color, Hardy as an oak, it grows canes from twelve to fifteen feet in length in one season and so is admirably suited for training around porches, or illustrated for training around porches, or illustrated for training around porches, unfavorable conditions better than any other variety. The blossoms retain their bright color and luster as long as the season lasts.

Rosemary

A RICH silvery pink rose that is as beautiful as its name. It is very vigorous and hardy, will withstand all extremes of climate and quickly forms a handsome shapely bush the first season planted. It flowers practically all the time—from early spring until late fall—producing of heavy satiny petals and stand out well from masses of blossoms brilliant in effect and exquisitely lovely, but most difficult to describe.

A DEEP, warm-glowing red rose. There is no other like it, either in growth or beauty. It is the ideal garden rose, thriving to perfection in any soil under the most adverse conditions. The blossoms are marvels of loveliness, composed to heavy satiny petals and stand out well from the plant, giving it a most regal appearance. This variety is the finest of all garden roses.

Meteor

FOR an intense rich, velvety crimson, there is no other rose to compare with this splendid new variety. It represents a new color in its class and is fast becoming the greatest of all crimson roses for home cultivation. It is always in bloom and its large, handsome double flowers in bloom and its large, handsome double flowers the flower expands until the whole bush fairly are produced in great quantities. It is a hardy glows with aving color and delightful fraplant with a vigorous rapid growth and its numerous charms will delight you.

Red Letter Day

A DELICATE ivery white rose—one of the most delightful and showlest of recent years and absolutely distinct—there is no other white rose quite like it. Its rich green foliage is unusually thick and close set, forming a plant of rare beauty. Its fragrance is superb and it produced on long stems freely and continuously. Its beautiful dark green foliage and profuse blooming qualities combined with absolute hardiduces an abundance of large magnificent blossoms ness make this one of the finest roses for masswith thick shell-shaped petals on long stiff stems.

Don't Sell Your Liberty Bonds-Save and Buy More Liberty Bonds or War Savings Stamps

HORTLY before going to press we received official notice that the Government is to launch the campaign for the next Liberty Loan on April sixth because that day is the anniversary of the declaration of war by Congress. The rate of interest and other details of the bonds are not stated but will be announced as soon as definitely determined. One thing is certain, that the coming issue of Liberty Bonds will be a desirable investment for anybody and especially for the small investor. Everyone is urged to subscribe for as many of these bonds as possible as a patriotic duty to help our Government carry on the war vigorously and hasten it to an early and victorious conclusion.

But in this connection Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo cautions against subscribing with the intention of selling again. He says: "One who subscribes for a Liberty Bond and gets credit as a patriot for doing so is not acting patriotically if he immediately sells that bond, that is, unless he imperatively needs the money. It is not the mere subscription that helps the Government, it is the actual loan; shifting the bond to some one else does not help.

"The same objection lies to exchanging Liberty Bonds in trade. Merchants offering to take Liberty Bonds in exchange for merchandise are doubtlessly actuated by patriotic motives, but such transactions tend to defeat a primary object of the bond sale, the encouraging of thrift and the discouraging of expenditures. Bonds so exchanged are in most cases immediately sold on the open market, which tends to depress the market price and affect adversely the sales of future issues.

"It is one of the great objects of the Treasury Department to have these bonds held as permanent investments by the people and paid for out of savings, thus at once providing funds for the government and conserving labor and material.

"There are the soundest reasons for holding Liberty Bonds. Their quotation under par on the stock exchange means a loss only to those who sell. The financial history of the United States shows that in times of peace all of its bonds have gone above par, some as high as 139." He gives convincing reasons for "the belief that our Government bonds are the safest investment in the world and with the restoration of peace conditions will command a handsome premium in the market."

Invest your savings, your spare cash, your ready money in Liberty Bonds or in Thrift Stamps and War Savings Stamps. Buy all you can with ready money. If you have not the ready money when the next Liberty Bond offering is made, and you can see a way to save the price of a bond in the next six months or a year buy one on the installment plan. Any bank will arrange for you to pay on the small weekly payment plan. Or, if you prefer, buy a 25-cent Thrift Stamp with every quarter you can save; and when you have sixteen exchange them for a five-dollar War Savings Stamp which is the same as a five-dollar Government bond and bears interest at four per cent. You can obtain either kind of stamp of your postnaster or of your Rural Delivery carrier. Ask him for printed circulars giving full information about these stamps. You can also buy the Liberty Bonds through your postmaster or any bank or express office. Teach the children thrift and patriotism by inducing them to save their pennies to buy Thrift Stamps. In order to win this war we must all save food, save fuel, save in every way possible consistent with health, and loan the Government the money which results from all savings. The very least that we, who remain safe at home, can do is to labor to the limit of our strength to increase production, and economize in every possible way to save in order that our savings of food, material and money may furnish food, clothing and ammunition for our young men who have gone to France, many to make the supreme sacrifice, to keep the cruel, barbarous, detestable Huns from maiming us, ravishing our women and desolating our homes. The utmost that we can do here is indeed a mere "bit" compared with the smallest sacrifices they are making over there. He is a contemptible traitor who would shirk any part of his duty to help our soldiers win the war as quickly as possible.

Benefits of Extending Your Range of Social and Business Intercourse

UR country is so great, with such diversityof climate ranging from humid to arid and ' from semi-tropical to semi-frigid, with such an infinite variety of mineral, agricultural and manufactured products, all resulting in so many different habits of life and means of making a living peculiar to the many different localities, that to travel and visit all parts and become acquainted with the people of all sections is an education of great practical value. Ours is the wonder land of immense natural resources and great opportunities for those who have the knowledge, the aptitude and the enterprise to grasp the situation at hand or to go where they can apply their skill and labor to the best advantage. Though comparatively few can afford the expense and time to travel far and wide to see it all, it is within the means of everybody to acquire a useful knowledge of all these things and to make the acquaintance of good people in any and all parts of the country through certain magazines of nation-wide circulation.

Our own magazine, Comfort, is a notable illustration. Each month it enters more than one and a quarter million homes; it is distributed from every post office in the United States and goes out on the thousands of rural delivery routes that radiate therefrom. It has regular subscribers in Alaska, the Canal Zone, Porto Rico, the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippines and in Canada. One of its most popular, interesting, instructive and useful features is that through our "Sisters' Corner" and "League of Cousins" departments our readers are introduced to good people in every walk of life and in every section of our own country and in these outlying regions. In their published letters they describe themselves, their families, homes, surroundings, manners of life, the country, the climate, natural resources, agricultural products, local industries, opportunities and social conditions. They exchange ideas on topics of general interest and to their, mutual benefit, not only through their published letters but many, who have thus become acquainted, have formed cherished friendships through personal correspondence with far distant subscribers.

Thus the Comfort Sisters and Comfort Cousins, North, East, South and West, hundreds and thousands of miles apart are brought together in thought and sympathy and unity of purpose and aspiration for mutual helpfulness in mental, moral and spiritual uplift as well as for the betterment of their material welfare. All this, besides the instructive and entertaining matter conveyed in the various other departments of our magazine, has been made possible by the cent-a-pound magazine postage rate having been level and uniform throughout our entire country and its dependencies, which has enabled us to send our publication at the uniform, low subscription price to all our subscribers, however far distant, anywhere in Uncle Sam's dominions. We have given our subscribers the benefit of the level postage

The new zone rates of magazine postage which will begin to go into effect in July, unless previously repealed by the present Congress, will ultimately raise our postage on Comfort from fifty to nine hundred per cent, according to distance, and necessarily will compel us to make a corresponding increase in our subscription rate. The blow is deliberately aimed at the magazines that have a nation-wide circulation with the malign purpose of crippling or destroying them. The local papers whose small circulation is mostly within the first two zones will scarcely be affected because the increase in postage rate in the first two zones is only half a cent a pound while beyond that it increases with distance ranging as high as ten cents a pound in the eighth zone. The local papers and magazines are all right in their way and serve a useful purpose, but manifestly they never can serve the same purpose as the magazines of nation-wide circulation, such as COMFORT. Those of small circulation can not afford to pay the price of high-class editorial and literary matter, and even if a large local circulation enabled them to command high-grade editors and staff writers they could not put their readers in touch with distant subscribers, because they do not have them. Necessarily a local paper gives you less for your money and it can not give you a wide range of acquaintances and correspondents. If you object to being discriminated against by the Government because of your location; if you are opposed to the ruthless destruction of the low-price magazines of large circulation; if you favor equal and uniform postal privileges for all sections of the country, sign and circulate our petition to Congress printed on page 14.

Don't be deceived by the pretensions of those enemies of the magazines, who would keep the people in ignorance, that the government can not afford to carry these publications long distances at the old rates which have been in effect for nearly forty years and which are four times the Canadian magazine rates. The U.S. Post-Office Department made a clear profit of nearly ten million dollars on last year's business. They talk about saving expense to the Government by cutting down the circulation of the magazines. It is preposterous. All the post offices and all the postal routes have to be maintained, and if the magazine circulation is cut out or largely diminished by prohibitive zone rates the Government will lose just that much direct revenue besides the incidental loss of an immense revenue from letter, money order and parcel-post business created by the magazines and the advertisements they carry It costs the Government just the same to maintain your rural delivery route regardless of whether the carrier handles one or a hundred pieces of mail on a trip, and the more mail he carries the more revenue the Government gets out of it. That is evident.

The Eyes of Our Navy

you have a pair of field glasses, binoculars, or a good spy-glass, tag it with your name and address, pack it securely and send it to Franklin D. Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C. Thousands of them are needed for the use of our officers and lookouts on our hundreds of new submarine-chasers, and as the market supply has been exhausted and they can not be obtained in sufficient numbers from the manufacturers the Government is appealing to the people to loan theirs to the navy. Don't send opera glasses or toy telescopes, but if you have a good field glass, spy-glass or binoculars, send them at once as directed. If found to be unsuitable they will be returned to you immediately. If they are what is wanted you will receive an immediate acknowledgment enclosing one dollar for the loan, and at the close of the war the glass will be returned to you to be treasured as a valued souvenir. If, however, it is lost or destroyed through a casualty of war, instead of its return you will receive notice of that fact and will have the satisfaction of knowing your glass has served to do battle with the sneaking German sea-wolves and to safeguard the passage of our troop ships and supply ships.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Lady Prescott, wife of Sir Athelstone Prescott, and her son Raymond, while traveling by coach, lose their way, and night overtaking them, they stop at a miserable inn, in a little fishing village on Flamborough Head. They are attracted to a little girl, Sfbyl, who waits on them. Her winning ways, her admittance of the cruel blows given by Mistress Sloan, and that her own mother would not do it, convince them that the innkeeper is not her father, and they determine to take the child away. Seeking Mistress Sloan, they learn that a woman who had been in a radroad smash up and injured leaves the child, who for weeks cries for Nansie. Mistress Sloan, for the consideration of thirty pounds, consents to let the child go, muttering she will keep her secrets. That night Sibyl is awakened and overhears Jem and his wife talking over the terms of the bargain, and through a chink in the wall she detects the place where an invaluable trinket, belonging to her, is concealed. The next morning she secures it. To Lady Prescott she traces, three letters "S. H. S.," which she dimly remembers and which convinces Lady Prescott that the gem is Sibyl's, and by it she may be restored to her own people. Five years later, her nineteenth birthday, Lady Prescott introduces her to society. She clasps a beautiful chain, to which is suspended the trinket, around her neck, and with Raymond they seek the drawing-room, where with Lady Prescott Sibyl assists in receiving the guests. Raymond, watching and anxious, admits to his mother how beautiful Sibyl is, and that no one attracts him as she does, and that his mother has the first right to his confidence. She will like mothing better than to keep her children with her. Sibyl is introduced to Miss Ada Therwin, the adopted daughter of Count Egbert Shirley and the guest of General Maplewood. Seized with a sudden faintness, Miss Therwin is carried to a quiet room. Sibyl remains with her. Regaining consciousness, Miss Therwyn refers to the ornament Sibyl wars, and to

IS tone was both entreating and reproachful, and touched her deeply.

"Ray, I am ashamed of myself, and I have been very foolish and inconsiderate, if not selfish," she replied, with charming frankness, yet with an "Nay, I shall not allow you to say such things about the 'Princess of the House of Prescott.' You shall still hold your castle and keep your treasures, only you must let me come in whenever I wish and share their beauty."

"Ray, I have no 'treasures' of knowledge; I am only a simple and unlearned girl even now, notwithstanding my six years of hard study," she said, humbly and half regretfully.

He laughed.

"Then don't be so shy of me any more." he

He laughed.

"Then don't be so shy of me any more," he answered. "Let me find out what you don't know, and if there is a vacuum in your storehouse, I'll help to fill it."

"Then I shall be happy, and you shall have no cause to complain of me again," Sibyl answered, running away to hide the delight in her eyes, and to don her wraps for their proposed expedition. expedition.

expedition.

She soon returned, and Raymond noticed at once the little Russia leather purse which he had given her so long ago, hanging from her arm. There was not a scratch or blemish upon it, and the clasps were as fresh and bright as then. "Are you always as careful of everything?" he asked, touching it gently with his finger. "Yes, of my treasures," she said, flushing, and giving him a quick, sly glance.

His face grew tender at her words. "You overestimated a little gift like that, I fear. But there is one thing which you have not been careful of."

"What is that?"

"The promise you made me when I gave you

"What is that?"

"The promise you made me when I gave you the purse—you have forgotten that."

"No, I have not; I never forget my promises," she returned, quickly, and then instantly regretted the words, for she knew that he would discover her little secret now.

"Sibyl," he said, with an inward start, and a quick, earnest glance into her face, "do you know to what I refer?"

"Yes," soffly, with downcast eyes.

opened it with fingers that were a trifle unsteady. Within the different pockets there were several bills and a few pieces of silver—for Sir Athelstone was very generous with his lovely ward—and a tiny key with a little chain attached, which he instantly recognized as belonging to the bag he had given her at the same time.

The inner pocket was carefully clasped, and looked as if it were seldom used.

Raymond opened this, and within lay two small golden coins!

The sight of these, although he had half-expected to find them there, made him look very grave.

Had she kept the gold from a feeling of pride, and to avoid coming to him for money, or because he had given them to her and she prized them as his gift?

Without a word, he closed the purse and returned it to Sibyl.

"You see I did not forget my promise, Ray." she said, archly, yet somewhat troubled by his grave looks.

"I see," he answered, quietly; then added: "Is that the way you keep all your promises?"

"No, of course not. But are you not pleased that I have kept the gold?" she asked, with a suspicious quiver in her voice.

"That depends upon why you kept it. Was it because you were too proud to ask me for money?"

"That was one reason. Ray; I never could ask

"That depends upon why you kept it. Was it because you were too proud to ask me for money?"

"That was one reason, Ray; I never could ask anybody for money," she returned, truthfully, though the confession came reluctantly. His face brightened a trifle.

"And what were your other reasons, Sibyl, if I may know?" he asked.

"They were the first gold I had ever possessed in my life—you gave them to me, and I was really very happy to have them; but——"

"Well, princess?"

"I suppose you think it very foolish in me."

"Which?" Raymond asked, mischievously—
"keeping them because you were so proud, or because they were your first gold and my gift?"

"Both," she answered, proudly, but with a keen pain in her heart.

She could not bear that he should laugh at her.
"Does it seem foolish to you, Sibyl?" Raymond asked, with a queer little smile, and a look that made her heart beat strangely.

"No; and I shall keep them just as long as I live, let others think of it as they may," she returned, lifting her head proudly, and with a trifle of passion in her voice, but the roses in her cheeks were very red.

"Little maiden, pardon—I did not mean to wound you," he answered, playfully, yet with winning gentleness; then added, "we will go and look at our picture now, and," with a tender cadence in his tones, "I will tell you afterward what I think of your promises and your foolishness."

His tones stirred her strangely, making her rayles best to the great wild maying in her hear to wall maying her to her to the may at wall maying in her hear to wall mayin what I think of your promises and your foolishness."

His tones stirred her strangely, making her pulse beat to the sweet, wild music in her heart. The picture which they went to see was one among a choice collection offered for sale by a noted artist.

Sibyl's shyness forsook her utterly as she gazed upon it. Her tongue was loosened, and Raymond could indeed find no fault with her unbounded delight, nor with the encomiums which she lavished upon it.

There were a number of other fine paintings among the collection, but nothing that impressed one like this; and, after examining them, they came back and stood before it again.

"I should never tire of it," Sibyl sighed, sinking upon a camp-chair to gaze at her leisure.

"That is all that I wanted to know, princess," Raymond said; and, leaving her sitting there, he sought the artist, and closed his negotiations for the picture on the spot.

When he returned to Sibyl, he found Miss Ada Therwin chatting gayly with her.

"Ah!" she exclaimed, with charming cordiality, as she gave him her hand, "how everybody flocks hither, like moths around a candle."

"Yes," Raymond answered, smilling, "there are quite a number of attractions here, although of rather a more substantial character than a candle."

"Which is your preference?" Miss Therwin asked asked.

"This one, since Sibyl has sanctioned it with her approval," he said, mentally comparing the two faces beside him.
"You have good taste, Miss Prescott."
"Thank you; but really I know very little—am a very poor judge of paintings," she modestly replied, adding: "I know, of course, when a picture pleases me, and this one impresses me; it makes me feel as if I were really upon those silent, star-studded waters, and could feel the soft, hazy atmosphere surrounding me. I think, too, as a work of art, it is very finely and evenly done."

done."

"It is so spoken of, I believe," assented Miss Therwin, with a little shrug of her shapely shoulders at Sibyl's entlrusiasm.

"I do not deserve, however, that Ray should give me the credit of his choice," Sibyl added, with a deprecating glance at him.

"Choice, Mr. Prescott!" exclaimed Ada, with a start, and turning to him with surprise, for she knew the enormous sum demanded for the picture. "Are you its happy possessor?"

quick, earnest glance into her face, "do you know to what I refer?"

"Yes," softly, with downcast eyes.

"May I look inside?" he asked again, touching the purse.

"Yes," once more, and the rich color flew to the velvet cheek.

He unclasped the purse from her arm, and the rheart was filled with rage.

"Then I shall beg permission to come and look at it whenever I like; and I congratulate you with all my heart, for it is a glorious thing."

Her manner was gracious and faultless, but her heart was filled with rage.

He had brought Sibyl to see it—it, perforce, needed Sibyl's sanction before he could complete his purchase.

"Thanks," Raymond returned. "I freely grant you the permission you crave, and am very glad you think so well of my purchase."

Hiding her feelings under a smiling mask, Miss Therwin gradually led him to speak of some of the other pictures, and detained him in an animated and quite lengthy discussion upon their different merits.

At parting, she said, with her sweetest smile: "Sibyl, I think I have found some one who needs a little of the kind care and attention which you so long to bestow."

"Who is it?" Sibyl asked, eagerly, her beautiful face all at once aglow with interest.

"A poor woman, who, until now, has managed to keep herself very comfortable; but a recent attack of rheumatism has completely unfitted her for labor; consequently, her resources for getting a living are entirely cut off."

"Poor thins! How did you find her out?"

"I was visiting a little girl living in the same house with her, yesterday, and she told me about the 'poor lady upstairs who had nothing to eat.' I went up to see her, and she really appears like a very nice kind of a person—Has evidently seen better days, and is quite depressed with her present destitution."

"Where did you say she lived?"

"I did not say, dear—how eager you are! But her home is No. 15 Algeria street, up two flights, first door, right-hand side. But," she added, laughing, as she saw Sibyl's face fall at this lengthy direction, "you can never find it yourself, and if you like I will call for you tomorrow, and take you to her."

"Oh, thank you—if you would, I should deem it a favor, and after the first visit I should not mind going alone. What is her name?"

"Mrs. Stillman. I judge she is a widow, and entirely alone in the world; though of course I could not discover so very much about her in one visit."

"No, certainly not."

After a few moments more spent in general conversation, they separated, Raymond and Sibyl returning home, and Miss Therwin to prep

CHAPTER XIV.

THE DUC D'AUBIGNE.

The DUC D'AUBIGNE.

That evening Sir Athelstone insisted that they should all attend the opera.

The entrance of their aristocratic party created no little sensation, both on account of the returned traveler—for Raymond caused an anxious flutter, especially among the feminine element, wherever he went—and of Sibyl's recent appearance in society.

Although it was somewhat annoying to Raymond to see so many lorgnettes leveled at his fair companion, yet he could not fail to experience also a feeling of pride and pleasure that her loveliness was thus appreciated.

And certainly tonight there was some apology for them, for one always turns instinctively toward the beautiful, in whatever guise it is found, and the young girl was supremely lovely. Although she immediately gave her attention to the stage, yet she could not but be aware that she was an object of especial observation, and soon became very much annoyed by the steady and persistent glare of a large opera glass only a short distance from their own box.

She noticed that the owner was a rather distinguished-looking man, possessing a large and powerful frame, light complexion, having a profusion of light golden hair, and a flowing silken beard.

But his prolonged stare was insolent and disagreeable in the extreme, and Sibyl felt almost

But his prolonged stare was insolent and dis-treeable in the extreme, and Sibyl felt almost agreeable in the extreme, and Sibyl felt almost as if she were being dissected beneath a powerful microscope.

After the first act, she turned to Raymond, and said, with a little laugh, though her eyes shone with indignation and her cheeks glowed botly:

shone with indignation and here hotly:

"I should judge, Ray, that people in coming to the opera did not reel it incumbent to retain their good breeding."

"They do seem to forget themselves more than usual tonight, I admit," he replied; then added, with an admiring glance: "And yet, I must confess, that I think there is some excuse for them myself."

myself."
"Et tu Brutet" Sibyl returned, flushing a still deeper crimson. "But," with a troubled look, "I do not like it at all, Ray, especially from that man on our left. I wish I might change my seat."

man on our left. I wish I might change my seat."

"You shall, dear," he answered, in a tone that she alone could hear, and meeting her beseeching glance with a deep tenderness in his own.

While the lights were being turnd down the change was effected, and Sibyl was effectually screened from observation by the silken curtains, and sat where no one but Raymond himself could feast his eyes upon her; and henceforth the knight of the big opera glass was obliged to content himself with views from the stage.

But the charm of the opera for Sibyl was gone. She heard the music, and knew it was good; she saw the different actors as they appeared and went through their parts, and seemed to be giving her undivided attention, to them; but the music of those softly spoken words, "you shall, dear," rang in her heart and brain to the exclusion of all else.

As they were about leaving the opera-house, Raymond said to his mother:

"We have cards for Lady Wilton's assembly, have we not?"

"Yes; but do you wish to go at this hour?"

"I gave her my promise that I would be present for a while at least. However, if you are too weary, I will see you to the carriage, and leave you there, only—"

"Only" what, Raymond?" queried the indulgent mother.

"Only' what, Raymond?" queried the indulgent mother.
"I want Sibyl to go, too, and she cannot, of course, without a chaperon," and his eyes rested proudly upon his lovely companion.
"Would you like to go, Sibyl?" asked Lady."
Prescott, turning to her.
"If you please, auntie, unless, as Ray says, you are too weary."
"Oh, no, dear—I think, on the whole, I would like it also."
The fond woman would have gone to the Antipodes if Sibyl and Raymond had desired.
Arriving at Lady Wilton's, our party found her rooms already thronged with guests.
Sibyl was presented in turn to her ladyship, who instantly turned and introduced a gentleman standing by her side.
"Miss Prescott, allow me—the Duc &Aubigne," she said.

Cibyl acknowledged the introduction with a who instantly turned and introduced a gentieman standing by her side.

"Miss Prescott, allow me—the Duc d'Aubigne," she said.

Sibyl acknowledged the introduction with a graceful inclination of her small, proud head, and then raised her eyes to observe her new acquaintance more closely.

To her intense astonishment, she found the gentleman to be the same whose rude glance had so haunted her all the evening.

Raymond was also presented, and then quickly but quietly drew Sibyl to a distant part of the room, which again caused the duke to reveal his handsome teeth in a smile, which, to say the least, was "peculiar," if not child-like and bland!

"A lover of "de emperess," perhaps?" he said to his right hand.

She shook her head, laughing.

"No, only a brother. Are you, too, taken by storm? Everybody seems to be growing wild over her beauty."

"Nay, not taken by storm, as you term it: nevertheless, the girl pleases me," he said, indifferently, as he gazed after the graceful, retreating form. "But you mistake; he is not her brother, he added, a moment after, turning to his hostess.

"Well, it amounts to the same thing; they have been reared together, although I believe they are in no way connected by birth."

"Then he is, or will be, her lover," quietly affirmed the stranger.

"What makes you think so?"

"I have seen too many cases of the same kind not to be familiar with the signs."

"Pshaw! I don't believe such an idea has entered Raymond Prescott's head. Why, he is years older!" exclaimed my lady, rather hotly. Miss Clara Wilton, a young lady of twenty-four, was yet "in the market," somewhat to her anxious mamma's vexation.

"She is, however, the brightest star in your rooms tonight. Kate," returned the duke, with his eyes still fixed upon the young girl.

"That is not a dangerous symptom, I believe, and will wear off in time," retorted the nobleman, with a rather contemptuous shrug of his broad shoulders.

"Two things which might occur, if the young lady in question should happen to come in contact with you very

"Two things which might occur, if the young lady in question should happen to come in contact with you very often, Arthur," she answered, quickly, and with a mocking laugh.

Clearly Lady Wilton had not any too much confidence in the morals of her guest.

"Thanks, Kate. I shall interpret that as a compliment, since you give me credit for possessing some power over goodness," replied his lordship, serenely, as he walked away.

The Duc d'Aubigne was a bachelor of about forty, strikingly handsome, yet to a pure mind it was not a good kind of beauty; immensely wealthy, and not noted for his incorruptible morals.

He had only returned the day before from one of his many wanderings, therefore had never until this evening heard of Lady Prescott's lovely ward. Another introduction he had that evening also, although it proved to be an old acquaintance, for he had met Miss Ada Therwin in Paris two years previously, when a desperâte flirtation ensued, and then, by mutual consent, was suddenly dropped.

sued, and then, by mutual considered dropped.

While they stood talking together tonight of the past, Raymond and Sibyl sailed by them in the dance.

The duc d'Aubigne paused in his conversation, and watched the pure, happy face, the rosy shimmer of her silken robes, and the gleaming of the diamonds in her hair until they had passed from his view.

from his view.

Then he said, as if speaking casually:
"A new star that, and—a very pretty one."
"Diamonds are always beautiful," observed
Miss Therwin, dryly.
"But I had reference to the lady, not the ornaments which she wears," laughed the duke.

Address Mrs. Wheeler Wilkinson, Cabe Comport, Augusta, Maine.

HE modest little woman whose letter is given below, asksome to print her letter if it- isn't too long. Just as though that would make the slightest bit of difference when it is one that means so much. It would be very selfish of me if I kept it to myself and did not let it make others as happy as it made me.

In the November Comfort she asked that the sisters send letters, cards, socks, etc., to her boy who had sailed overseas, and now comes the good news that he received one hundred and fifty letters the night he landed in France. Just think of that! It makes me feel that after all we are accomplishing something worth while. Wasn't that the best possible welcome for him, especially if the letters were cheery ones, calculated to make a man feel more a soldier than ever, and not the sob variety that are so depressing to all concerned, for, somehow, our sorrows seem almost unbearable when we read them, so it is the duty of every mother, wife and sweetheart to make her letters brave and cheerful.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I must take advantage of the Sisters' Corner in dearold Comport to answer the two hundred kind and cheery letters which I received in answer to my letter which appeared in November Comport. I would answer each one individually if I could, but it is simply impossible, so please, dear sisters, actept my sincere thanks for the kind letters and the good books and magazines. I can never thank all enough, for the letters and parcels that were sent to my soldier laddle.
He received one hundred and fifty letters the night he reached France, November 18, but he could not find time to answer all of them, but he wrote me how glad he was to receive them. I have not heard from him since Christmas but feel sure the parcels reached him all right.

My husband was discharged from the hospital some time ago but will never be very strong again. My health is fine this winter, better than it has been for twenty years.

Do you know that one can put an unbelievable amount of corn meal in the bread if it is made into a well-cooked, smooth mush first?

I've just made two very pretty muffs for little girls, from the backs of their old curly coats. Lined them with a piece of thick bed quilt and then with black sateen from an old coat lining. One I had to patch, and I trimmed the large three-cornered patch with pearl buttons. The other muff was trimmed with tassels. Am going to make one for myself from an old collarette of plush. I love to make pretty things, don you?

"I am forty-seven," he runned, rather grimly, stopping by the lower door. "Now run off and amuse yourself. I must go and condole with Mrs. Damerel. Did you know she wanted me to send seven miles after dark for a bunch of mistletoe? In October!" and he deliberately, and of a set purpose, never turned his eyes towards his wife during the remainder of the evening, and when "kitchen lanciers" rent the air, retired, without ostentation, to the library.

It was dark and he turned on the electric light irritably.

"What did you do that for?" said the cross voice of Sir Thomas. "Oh, I beg your pardon, Levallion! I didn't know it was you."

him. "It must be one of the servants, but I'll just find out!"
Whatever deviltry Hester had in mind should not be done. He would, from a safe screen of crange-trees, that would keep him from view of the people inside or out of the greenhouse, watch his lawyer had that day received his 'orders, had had seen and suppose she frightened Raye woman was capable of anything—as he had good cause to know—and suppose she frightened Raye her words then the stared through the leaves till his eyes ached, he saw no more of that prowling wolf outside; he was just going away, when two people sat, down on a secluded sean to a yard away from him and effectually cut off his retreat. For as he hestitated for one second, he heard his own name, in Rayenel's voice.

"Moster it had been any one else "he who was not a yard away from him and effectually cut off his retreat. For as he hestitated for one second, he heard his own name, in Rayenel's voice.

"I tell you Levallion had nothing to do with it," she was saying angrily. "If I thought he had, I'd want to kill him—or I'd go with you." "What did you want to ask me?", Adrian Gordon made no direct answer.

"Two things, though they don't matter to me now," wearily. "I wanted to know why you said you were too poor to marry me when you were Levallion's heir—though I didn't know it."

Levallion stood paralyzed. Hester, then, had not lied—for a wonder! He felt as if something hurt him unbearably, but he did not even try to escape it. He wondered dully what Gordon would say.

"I can't tell you, except that I," lamely, "always thought he would marry."

Levallion, white with relief, leaned against his orange-tub. Though, of course, he had known Adrian would never tell his wife the thing she asked.

"Can't you see" said Rayenel fiercely. "that it's the only weak point in the whole thing, I I know about the letters. I know about the ring; but this hurts me because—".

"Because it looks like a lie." Perhaps Levallion was no more sick at heart than Adrian. "Well, it is quite true! I never counted on being Levallion's heir." though if she had not been Levallion's heir." though if she had not been Levallion's wife he might have given a different answer.

"I believe you—don't be angry! I feel as if all the world were a lie since—since Sylvia," her voice, that began passionately, broke off in dragging despair, "separated you and me."

"What was the other thing?" 'said Adrian slowly. "Nel, for God's sake, take off that black hood and let me see your face! I am going away tomorrow," with quiet and jealous pain. "Why have you got on white poffnies? The real ones always smell to me like laudanum—and death!"

"T've got them on because they mean oblivion." she answered bravely. "T've got to live my life, Adrian. I made it for myself—and Levallion has been good to me. The only way I can go on with it is to forget."

"What about me?" very low.

"You can fight it out as well as I can," bitterly. I can't get rid of Levallion even to please you."

He put his untasted supper of plain almond soup, which was all he ever took at night, on the first floor for Mr. Jacobs, who licked the plate scrupulously clean, and immediately after was as thoroughly and scrupulously sick. Sir Thomas hastily removed him as a footman removed the remains, and, being a conscientious master, dosed him till he was sick again, for there was froth about his mouth, and Sir Thomas feared fits.

It was not a pretty incident, but luckily only Levallion and Tommy beheld it—unless the outraged cook peering through the pantry door saw the insulting treatment Levallion gave his soup. No one else thought anything about it.

CHAPTER XXII. THE MOONLIGHT PICNIC.

Levallion, contrary to his custom, rose early the next morning and repaired to Mrs. Murray's house, meaning to strike terror into her soul by threats of withdrawing her allowance.

There was ho smoke coming from her chimneys, and, as he was about to dismount and knock her up, an untidy female emerged from the back premises and announced that their late tenant had decamped without the formality of giving notice. She had, to the station-master's knowledge, taken a ticket for London on the preceding morning, and Levallion decided, with some relief, that it must, after all, have been a litchen-maid whom he and Tommy had seen looking in the conservatory.

"One did," obstinately.

"Then I don't know who," and Levallion was been a dark hing for a great thing; don't fuss of a great thing; bettly, inch by inch, he made his way past their unconscious backs, doing his Jest not to hear any more. He was a dishonorable eavesdropper, already, but he did not care. He would not have any one else hear, though, and that rutling of sike had been unpleasantly close.

Whoever it had been the present to tell Tommy they had seen a kitchen maid watching the quality; hurried to the picture-gallery to see who was missing besides Ravene!

"Gad, I wish it had been any one else", thought, wretchedly. For the only woman abent was Lady Gwendolen Brook, of the orange gown and the evil orchicls. And that she entered at that moment did not reassure him, for with he was Scarsdale, and Jimmy Scarsdale believed in the honor of neither man nor woman, and always say. "Levallion, have you seen Ravenel?" cried the dichess. "We're waiting for her to go to supper."

The two latest arrivals exchanged glances. "Then don't wait," returned Levallion lazily, with his best manner. "She's with Adrian in the conservatory. I don't wonder you're hunry," I am quité a wreck. I interfered with my cook samours, and-he quite cowed me with his dinner tonight. Come, if you wish me to live till morry in work of his guests, as he took her down-stairs. "She's had timé enough," Lady Gwendolen and Scarsdale, were close behind him, "to say everything by now. She hasn't been up here for an hour. I wonder—"

Scarsdale hushed her by a look at Levallion, but not good enough to quarrel for. Besides, Lady Levallion and Scarsdale hushed her by a look at Levallion, but not good enough to quarrel for. Besides, Lady Levallion and Scarsdale hushed her by a look at Levallion, but have young dread here. The man here were close behind him, "to say everything by now. She hasn't been up here for an hour. I wonder—"

Scarsdale hushed her by a look at Levallion, but here of the mask and hood like the others, and, under her crown of poppies, her face was white, exhanged glances where the present the said and the contract of the present the present the face of a woman who with a glance at the fern-covered stone on the path.

"The dog is dangerous. He threatened my life," with a majestic rage.

"You are quite wrong, the dog is harmless. If you are afraid of him, remember that you will be quite safe in your kitchen. This—is my garden!" She turned her back in a manner the duchess would have envied. "Come, Tommy, and bring the dog."

"Why were you so down on him?" Tommy inquired when they were out of ear-shot. "I really believe Jacobs would have bitten him. Goodness knows why, but he hates the man?"

"So do I," hotly. "There is not a seat in the garden where I can go without finding him in the neighborhood. I feel as if he had the evil eye on something; he makes me shiver. Levallion's going to send him away."

"When's Gordon going?" said Tommy abruptly. "Tomorrow." She grew scarlet. "Tommy," she said miserably, "don't be horrid to me! I don't deserve it. I don't mean even to speak to him before he goes."

"All right," gruffly, but he slipped his arm, in hers as he had not done since he came. "I say, Ravenel, I'll be glad when the others go! They're no good, except the duchess."

"I can't bear them," with sudden viciousness. "I feel all the time that if I were down in the world not one of them would speak to me—even Lady Chayter. The others are—well, her lady-ship was a good imitation of them!"

"That reminds me." he picked up Mr. Jacobs and rolled him in Ravenel's cloak. "I'm sure I saw the old Umbrella yesterday, in the village."

"Oh, nonsense!"

"I did, then; looking mighty out at elbows. What do you bet she'll not be up here, whining to you?"

"She can whine," deliberately, for whatever Lady Annesley had done, it was sure to be no secret to the Umbrella. "Hateful old wretch!" spet hot all over when I think how I used to hate him."

"Beats me how Levallion ever was a friend of Sylvia's," observed Tommy idly. "By George, I get hot all over when I think how I used to hate him."

"He's kind," in a stifled voice. "But oh, Tommy! Sometimes I feel as if I should scream, with the shut-u him."

"He's kind," in a stifled voice, "But oh, Tommy! Sometimes I feel as if I should scream, with the shut-up-ness of being grand! The fine clothes and too much to eat, and—it's rather awful being Lady Levallion!"

"It's better than her ladyship," the boy said dully. "Brace up, Ravenel! Nobody in the world is downright happy, I believe."

He lit one of Levallion's cigarettes to avoid conversation, and refused to see she was crying.

CORN MEAL—OUR ALLY

CORN MEAL LOAF WITH TOMATO SAUCE.

Saved Our Pioneers. By Its Help We Shall Win the War

MERICA'S commander-in-chief in France, General Pershing, about the middle of February, made a two-days' inspection of the American sector northwest of the Toul. Wearing a "tin hat" (the soldiers' name for steel helmet), with a gas mask swung over his chest at the alert position, General Pershing dropped down into the dugouts and visited batterles busy hurling "iron rations" at the enemy.

CORN MEAL WITH APRICOTS

Splasning through the mud and slipping on the ice, he inspected all the first line trenches, asking innumerable questions, especially of the men with regard to food.

Of one mess cook, General Pershing asked what they had for dinner. The cook replied that they had roast beef, potatoes, onions, white bread, coffee and rice pudding.

Then turning to a long line of soldiers with mess kits in their hands, the General asked:
"Do you men get enough to eat out here?"

The line saluted briskly and almost in a chorus came the reply:
"Yes, sir."
One young infantryman asked: "Who is that with the four stars on his coat?" After being informed by a comrade, he replied, "Is that so? Whoever saw a commander-in-chief of an army walking around in a trench asking privates if their feet were dry or if they had enough to eat? It is not being done!"

But General Pershing is determined that the American soldiers at all times shall have the maximum of protection under the best conditions possible.

Let us again read: "Roast beef, potatoes,

American soldiers at all times shall have the maximum of protection under the best conditions possible.

Let us again read: "Roast beef, potatoes, onlions, white bread, coffee, and rice pudding," that we may fix in our-minds the stern fact that wheat flour must be sent to our soldiers. Not that our brave men would not enjoy corn bread and graham muffins, but no bread making material will endure the over-sea journey and exposure to the elements as well as wheat flour.

Corn saved our pioneyrs; in Colonial times it was the chief cereal food of our people. Corn is still our largest crop; we have an abundance of it, and in our own diet we must substitute corn and other cereals for wheat to the extent of reducing our consumption of wheat: at least one third below that of last year in order to feed our soldiers and our allies. How much wheat flour can be saved to send abroad depends largely on the American housewives. Thousands of families in New England, from choice, eat corn or graham bread for breakfast every morn-well as conducive to good health.

There is no real hardship in what is asked of us in aid of food conservation. We are cautioned not to reduce our diet in quantity or quality below the requirements of health and bodily vigor, and, above all, not to limit the food of growing children. We are asked to substitute equally nourishing and wholesome foods that are plenty for foods needed for war purposes.

Poultry is not classed as "meat" by the Food Administration. Therefore, on meatless days we may eat poultry as well as eggs and fish. But the pressing need at present is for more wheat four for export to Europe, and, if we are to wim the war, we must make the savings in our homes.

One word more: Guard against half-hearted attempts at conservation. Go at it with the spirit of a soldier, that you may reap the full reward of having done your bit. Let your slogan be: "Until the End of the War."

War-Winning Hints and Recipes

War-Winning Hints and Recipes

A cup of corn meal gives even more fuel to your body than a cup of wheat flour.

Stop buying white bread, and make spider corn cakes, brown bread and graham muffins. You will conserve and save money at the same time. Eat vegetables. It will help Uncle Sam and improve your health.

In substituting a pure vegetable shortening in a recipe, leaving all other ingredients the same, it must be remembered that the vegetable shortening goes further than butter or lard.

When using molasses and soda with the heavier flours, use a little baking powder in addition, as these flours require more leavening. It is also well to add a little baking powder to the heavier flours when used in making yeast bread. Sift it though the flour.

The month of April is always a happy one for the children, and April Fool and Rainy Day parties are in order. The accompanying cuts and recipes will assist the mother who is endeavoring to hold to her conservation standards, and with the appropriate decorations, and the usual "Bug-on-your-back!" jests for entertainment, the expensive cake and candies will not be missed.

JESTER LOAF.—Pour two cups of bolling water over two cups of fine corn meal and stir. When lukewarm, add one quarter of a yeastcake dissolved in one third cup of lukewarm water, one half cup of molasses, one teaspoon of salt, one eighth teaspoon of soda and two cups of rye flour. Beat hard, and let rise over night; in the morning, beat again, add one half cup each of seeded raisins and chopped nuts, pour into an angel cake pan, and bake in a moderate oven two hours. The jester decorations which always delight children, are made by inserting a jester's cap, Nade from cardboard, into the center opening, and ornamenting it with paper rosettes and a fringe about the crown. From the center of loaf, hang strips of paper of different lengths, and at the end of each sew a tiny jester's bell. If the loaf is made from a cake mixture, cover with white frosting before decorating.

POTATO FOOL.—Cook potatoes in boiling salted water; drain and shake over hot cover until dry and then mash. To each cup, allow one tablespoon of butter, one half teaspoon of salt, a dash of red pepper, and hot milk enough to make a creamy consistency. Have prepared a filling made from left-over fish chopped fine, and to one cup add half a cup of bread crumbs, salt and pepper, and egg gravy enough to moisten. The addition of onion juice improyes the flavor. Make a mound of potato and scoop out the center and put in the meat filling, then add more potato, making it into a pyramid shape to represent a Fool's Cap. The filling should be completely concealed. At the base, decorate with passley or celery leaves, and down the side have the word Fool cut from red beets. The filling and potato should be handled very quickly and from hot dishes to prevent chilling.

Corn Dodgers.—In a mixing bowl put two cups of corn meal, granulated or bolted, one teaspoon of salt, and two teaspoons of fat. Over this pour two scant cups of bolling water and beat well. When cool, form into thin cakes and the teaspoons of corn meal, granulated or bolted, one teaspoon of salt, and two teaspoons of fat. Over this pour two scant cups of bolling water and beat well. Do you live your life and let your neighbors live theirs in the sweet satisfaction of letting one another alone? Or do you keep an eye across the way, and spy out the things that are not meant for public gaze, and then whisper them to the neighbor next door? If you do this you are no better morally than the street Arab who picks your pocket. Dishonest prying and tattling are in effect character picking. Gossip begets gossip. While you are stabbing others in the back, are you sure your own ribs are invilnerable and that your neighbor's stiletto does not find an entering place for as deadly a thrust as the one you give? ERE is a letter from an American friend of the Kaiser, one of many native and foreign-born citizens and residents of the United States who approve of the aims of Prinssian military despotism and sanction its fieadish methods; who are doing their utmost to help the cause by promoting the German pacifist propaganda in America and trying to frighten our people into believing that it is useless and hopeless to attempt to oppose German might and frightfulness. France has just convicted and sentenced to death, for treason, one of her promisment citizens for his activities, as the paid agent of the Kaiser, in promoting in America and France pacifist and terrorist agitation precisely in line with the views expressed by the author of this letter, who shows wise caution in not signing her name. She says her husband emigrated to America, at the age of fifteen, to escape military service in the land of his birth, and now she wants me and everybödy else in this country to adopt the views of the German citizen would she have us imitate? The kind that is murdering old and young and outraging women whenever and wherever they fall into his hands, that is enslaving all conquered peoples and trying to enslave the world? Or the kind that dodges that is enslaving all conquered peoples and trying to enslave the world? Or the kind that dodges that is enslaving all conquered peoples and trying to enslave the world? Or the kind that dodges that is enslaving all conquered peoples and trying to enslave the world? Or the kind that comes here to grow up with the country, and fight for its defense, if necessary. She writes:

"Uncle Charlie, Dear Sir: It is with deep regret that I find you indulge in the hate propaganda now so popular. Have you ever considered this matter from a German citizen's standpoint? (Yes, I have, but you have never considered it from an American citizen's point of view.—Uncle Charlie.) My husband left the old country when he was fifteen years old to escape being a soldier and now finds that we have to fight this same military system barehanded as it were, for what is a few weeks of training or even months against the most efficient fighting machine under the sun. (Britain's little army made that 'wonderful' German machine hide like a rat in a hole for two years and smashed it every time it showed its nose.—Uncle Charlie.) My husband is a native born Teuton but a U. S. citizen now. Germany has the best trained soldiers and her officers are brought up to a military career from childhood. This is no idle boast for she has proved this in the three years of terrible fighting. Ex-President Roosevelt is also dong his very best to stir up trouble. (He's stirring up trouble for Germany—that's why you don't like him.—Uncle C.) I have inclosed a few newspaper clippings so will add no comment whatever, and so give you a chance to throw your cowardly roaring at me. You hide behind the public safety bogey and the Federal authorities. Don't forget the message of Christmas, the same even in war "Peace on earth, good-will to men." We have good-will for men, but not for murderérs.—Uncle Charle.)

"A Reader of Comfort.

This letter is typical of scores that I receive which mean just this: The American people are to be kept in ignorance of Germany's horrible blood-guiltiness and to know nothing of her dastardly deeds and of her wicked, wanton attempts to conquer Europe and later on, America, and then the whole world. If the writer could have her way we should remain utterly ignorant of this terrible danger, lulled into a sense of false security to oblige German sympathizers, until the Prussian wild beast sprang upon us, tore us to pieces, while people of the writer's stripe went out to meet the conquerors with beer and coffee. Because we dare to show this wild beast up in its true colors we are accused of stirring up hate. This letter is a perfect specimen of that insidious German propaganda which has done its fiendish work in all sections of the world, in making people impotent and helpless in the presence of the German invader and ravisher. God knows I have every sympathy for every loyal German in this.country, but none for those who prattle of loyalty and who run away from military duty then try to close our lips and scare us with tales of the terrible efficiency of Germany's war machine so that we'll run away also. We are not to be silenced and we are not to be scared and when we are through with that German machine it will look like thirty cents with a hole in it. Germany has licked three little nations—a fine record. Russia has licked many's war machine so that wen full away also. We are not to be scared and when we are through with that German machine it will look like thirty cents with a hole in it. Germany has licked three little nations—a fine record. Russia has licked herself—thanks to German lying, spying and buying. As for Teddy Roosevelt, the finest type of virile Americanism in the world today, would to God we had ten billion like him. Any big, strong man who hits enemy plotters and criticizes incompetence and speaks out for America is bound in these days to arouse the hate of quitters and the disloyal. When Germany acknowledges her guilt and asks forgiveness of a world she has outraged, then and not till then can humanity afford to lay down its arms and take her back into the family of nations. It is madness to talk of peace and good-will to a mation that is cutting the throat of the world. To do so would be to play Germany's game and that game has been played long enough in this country and we'll stand no more of it. Even the Kaiser's own newspapers are calling him a "Hangman." That ought to open this writer's eyes but it won't. In any of the warring countries except this, any one who wrote a letter like this would have to face a firing squad. God give the writer sense and us patience. To invoke the law against the disloyal is the duty of every patriotic citizen. The existence of our country is threatened. We cannot and will not allow our enemies to openly flout us, and vent their venom upon us for doing our duty to God and our Country.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort—and keep at it until you have the entire set. ESTHER, N. C.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a bachelor of twenty-two summers, have dark brown hair, blue eyes, and am a tiller of the soil. I honestly don't think so much will be gained by the overthrow of Germany. What is to prevent the victorious nations from fighting among themselves after the war? They have broken treaties in the past, why not again. We could not avoid entering this war, but I think we should only fight until we have put Germany into a position where she cannot again murder our citizens traveling on the high seas. Have not the Germans as good a right to their form of government as we have to ours, and if the German soldiers are not satisfied with their government why the deuce don't they rebel and overthrow it? The Germans could adopt a democratic form of government and still be as great a menace to us as ever. I think Mr. Wilson should make public a statement telling exactly what we are fighting for and on what terms we can make peace.

Sincerely yours,

CARL A. MANESS.

we are fighting for and on what terms we can make peace.

Sincerely yours,
Carl A. Maness.

Your letter, Carl, shows an amount of superficial thinking that is appalling. Our war alms have been stated a thousand times. Lick your enemy before you talk about peace or don't start fighting. Germany can have any old form of government she wishes. She can stay in the dark ages where she is now forever, if she desires. If people want to be slaves to a tyrant dressed up like a peacock that is their privilege, but when these same people think they are superior to everyone else and that all other peoples are dirt and ought to be conquered and placed under subjection, and they start murdering their neighbors, filling the earth with their spies, debauchers and fire fiends, then it's time that such monsters were soundly thrashed, made to behave or wiped off the face of the earth. Nations have broken treaties, but none so flagrantly as Germany. The victorious nations, if this country puts its full force into this last fight of right against might, will be Britain, France, Italy and the United States. They are democratic nations, with a common ideal and a common purpose. They are not militaristic nations as Germany is and will not fight among themselves, for they have nothing to fight about and have all suffered horribly and hate war and everything conmected with war. They are penceful, progressive people, seeking only to be left alone, but Germany would not let them or us alone. She has outraged every law of God and man and must be brought to her senses (if she has any) otherwise decent people have got to get off the earth, for life under the brutal military heel of Germany would be intolerable, even for a dog. German would be intolerable, even for a dog. German woldiers if they wished, could replace their present autocratic form of government with a democratic point of view, is hundreds of years behind that of other countries. The German likes to be bossed around, he does not know how to act without orders. Germany must be t

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am anxious to get the history of the early settlers of Ohio. The first settlers came down the river on a raft, and settled at Marietta. I want the names of the early settlers if you know them. I have hunted for the history but failed to find it. Please answer my letter personally. You talk of Maria and Billy the Goat but you never say what your name is.

Your niece,

Callie, I fear you are not very observant, as my name has appeared in Comfort scores of times in the last fifteen years. It has appeared over scores of poems and songs and other special matter. For information about Marietta write to the Ohio Historical Society. Address all inquiries about conditions in any state to the governor of that state in which you are interested, and his secretary will send your letter to those whose business it is to attend to such matters. Marietta was named in honor of Marie Antoinette, and was founded in 1788 by a company of revolutionary officers from New England under the leadership of General Rufus Putnam. In Marietta is located Marietta College which possesses a library of 60,000 volumes, which doubtless contains all the information you seek. Every home should have an encyclopedia which costs but a trifle which tells you about everybody of note that ever lived and everything of consequence that ever lappened. All people care about, however, is pleasure. Knowledge and education, the only worth-while things in the world, are shunned and igpored. I know from bitter experience. The first people that tried to settle at Marietta were a bunch of men who came down the river on a raft to see if they could not Marry Etta. The raft broke however, and they settled at the bottom of the river. Wasn't that too bad?

is what I can do at home. I can wash dishes, herd cattle, and milk, crochet and read papers and books, I can feed the horses and cattle. That is all I can think of now.

Your loving niece,
MYRTLE G. RAMSEY.

Myrtle, put your horse in a barn, not a born. People who make their a's like o's and nearly all children do it, cause a tremendous lot of trouble in this world. We are glad to know you can milk, crachet and read papers. With milk at 17 cents a quart it is good to know that this indispensable fluid can be obtained, probably at a much lower price, from paper instead of cows. Your experience with your good, practical teacher, Miss Jones, has made me burst into rhyme:

Poor Miss Jones, you can hear her groans And likewise hear her kicking; For her tongue's encased in a dark brown taste, When she gives her scholars a licking.

We are glad to know that Miss Jones only had to lick a few of her pupils. Think how ter-rible it would be if she had to lick them all. She would be a dyspeptic for life.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have been reading your department in COMFORT for a long time and am much interested in the League of Cousins. My sister also takes COMFORT. I am a boy nineteen years old, and never talked to a girl in my life. I can hoe corn and tob. I milk the cows and live nine miles from Milton on a big 150-acre farm. We have one horse, ducks, chickens and dogs, and I go hunting very often. I wish you were up here to help me strip tob. I would like to hear from some of the cousins. I will close hoping Billy the Goat won't get this. Your new cousin, James Devose, R. 3. DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

the cousins. I will close hoping Billy the Goat won't get this. Your new cousin, James Devose, R. 3.

James, to refrain from talking to girls is not customary with the boys of today, most of whom are in the habit of forcing their attentions upon young ladies without invitation or excuse, or the formality of an introduction. This practice is becoming more common and gives evidence of a lack of respect for the gentler sex and a breaking down of those conventionalities which alone keep society from degenerating into a barnyard or jungle. So you want me to come and help you strip Tob? Who is Tob anyway? And what has he done that he should be deprived of his clothing in this atrociously cold weather? I don't care for this stripping game anyway. Germany has stripped Belgium and Northern France, Poland, Serbia and Roumania. Now the anarchistic Bolsheviki are stripping the banks in Russia and seven thousand corpses have been taken out of the Neva River in Petrograd; thanks to anarchy and idiocy masquerading as socialism. Nobody is working and nothing is being produced in Russia except crime and bloodshed, and those who have clothes are being stripped of them by thugs and thieves who can obtain fortunes by selling the apparel of their victims. If you want any help to strip people of ignorance, stupidity, prejudice, bigotry and narrow mindedness, call on me, but I positively refuse to remove anyone's clothing. The Goat says that Tob is the abbreviation for tobacco, and all you want me to do is to help you strip tobacco. Great Heavens! James, why didn't you tell me so?

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

My grandpa has got nine little pigs. My papa has a Ford car. We go riding most every day. I go to Sunday school most every Sunday. I am eight years old. I would like to see this in print. Well this is all for this time?

From your niece,
IRVA EATON.

Yours must be a very happy family Irva, and much to be envied. Think of a family these hard times that is the proud possessor of a Ford car and nine pigs. The Ford car would not be of much use to me, but I could do a lot with the pigs. I'm glad to know you go to Sunday school. If there were as many Sunday schools in America as there are saloons, and as many Sunday schools in Germany as beer gardens, and they all had good, live teachers, who could bring up children to be soldiers of Christ, we would soon have the war lords put out of business. When children get the right kind of education seven days a week instead of five and are brought up in a Christlike way, war and contentions will cease. Walk with God and you will walk right and the Sunday school is the place to find God, and it is there you will learn to make him your companion and guide through life.

You surely are a well-posted man. You give the world the best there is in you. You have been a great blessing to humanity. You give the truth in the strongest and simplest way. Your judgment is good. I am working in a Magnesite Mine, located on one of the beautiful hills that surround Hemet Valley. Hemet Valley is small but it is one of the most beautiful valleys in California, and is 95 miles South East from Los Angeles. Magnesite is white as chalk and is very scarce. I am deeply interested in what you have to say, about the war. Wilson has incre power than very scarce. I am deeply interested in what you have to say about the war. Wilson has hore power than any king. If we would use that ten billion dollars for coast defence I think it would be to a much better advantage. It looks like hell to send the bloom of our dear country over to the trenches along with billions of wealth, from which we expect nothing. People in the U. war in its proper light, have utterly failed. In order that we may effectively fight the Kaiser who is an autocrat and a tyrant, we are obliged, in a crisis of this kind to invest our President also with autocratic power, so that he may be able to act instantly in emergencies and meet every situation as it arises without delay. President Wilson acts for a limited period, for a nation of free people, for their best interests, the Kaiser, who is a tyrant and an accident of birth acts only for the Hohenzollern dynasty and the interests of a despotic, titled, military caste. So you think it looks like hell to send the bloom of our country to the trenches in Europe do you? It would look still more like hell if we didn't. Did it look like hell to France when she sent the bloom of her youth in men, and money, under General Rochambeau and Admiral De Grasse to help us win our freedom? We owe France a great debt, we would be dastards if we did not repay it. You would fight a defensive war here, would you? and leave France and Britain, who have been shedding their blood for our protection, as well as their own, the democratic nations of western Europe, to their fate, while you snuggled down safe in your little old mine in California. That's a fine doctrine for a nation of curs but not, for men. You would let Germany bring the war to our shores and make a Belgium of our country. (Don't think we could keep her out.) If freedom is to live in this world, the free nations of the world must stick together. Apparently you do not realize the horror of the German menace. Let every American man and woman thank God that owing to the bravery of the French and British, we can fight the Hun in devastated Europe, instead of invaded, devastated America. You are right, people are thinking as they never thought before, but alas, tens of thousands will persist, like yourself, in spite of all I have done to put the truth into their brains, in thinking evrong. Now please get it right this time.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE AND COUSINS:

I come to thank you for those wonderful books that you sent me. I am not flattering them Uncle Charlle but the song book, story book and book of poems are the best books of their kind I have ever seen.

Uncle, I am one that tries to obey the league rules. Uncle, I see you publish more of the girls' letters than the boys. We boys think that you are partial toward them. I am eighteen years old, weigh one hundred and forty-two pounds, five feet and eight inches tall, have light complexion and black eyes and hair. Would like to hear from the cousins.

Your loving nephew,

TROY IVESTER. (League No. 36,638.)

So Troy, you think I am partial to the girls do you? Well I surely am. I'd be a queer kind of a male thing if I were not. Sex however, has nothing to do with the selection of letters that go into this department. The thing that counts is the idea. If there is a thought in the letter that offers opportunity for a profitable discussion, or some ludicrous error of spelling, grammar or diction, the correction of which will both instruct and amuse, it is eagerly selzed on and marked for comment and publication. The best letters that come to me are penned by girls and women. Girls on the average stay longer at school than boys, and take them as a whole they are more idealistic and more ambitious. I get lots of inspiring and encouraging letters from men young and old, but many more from girls. The great tragedy in conducting a department of (CONTINUED ON PAGE 16.) (CONTINUED ON PAGE 16.)

WOMAN'S voice spoke softly, and yet frightenedly, in French that came with anything but a natural accent: "Monsieur- are you awake now, monsieur?"

Elwood heard her and moved his limbs, at which his left shoulder gave him a sharp pain. A warm hand passed over his brow, and he somehow realized that his head was bandaged. Then he struggled to a sitting posture in the plitchy darkness. Not even a star was in sight. By the slight rustle that accompanied his movements he knew that he had lain on a bed of straw, but he knew very little else. He was dazed.

"Where are we, madame?" he asked, also in French that was halting and incorrect. "Or is it mademoiselle."

"It is mademoiselle, monsieur," came readily from the darkness to his right. "We are in the basement of the ruined house of M. George Lane, the American, in the old town of B——, which George Lane, the American, in the old town of B———, which has just suffered a German drive and is now behind the German lines. Do, you not remember, monsieur; you fell; your machine was shot out of control by the Boche machines, and you fell in the street outside—"

"Yes, yes," broke in Elwood; "I remember now. They shot me down. I was on my way back to the French lines to report——why, mademoiselle, I should be going!"

And he added in plain English: "Was there ever such rotten luck!"

The young woman gave an exclamation of both

"Oh, you are an American!" also in English.

"Why, so am I. And we were laboring along in French! But as to your going, it is impossible. Listen!"

sible. Listen!"
Elwood now recognized the bothersome noises he had been hearing constantly since his senses had returned. It was the booming of French seventy-fives and German howitzers, the rattling staccato of machine guns, the intermittent cracking of infantry rifles, the deep rumbling of excluding shells.

"It is hardly safe in this basement," the feminine voice went on. "At any moment one of the French shells may go over its mark, alight in the ruins above, and bury us completely. But it was this or worse than death, so I chose this."

this."

Elwood did not question the correctness of anything she had told him. Now that there was to be some waiting and the resultant inactivity, he found that he was in possession of a miserably aching head and a shoulder that seemed broken.

"I am Miss Catherine Lane," she reciprocated; and he wondered dizzily how she looked. "I am a niece of George Lane," she went on. "My uncle married a wealthy French woman, and came here to carry on her affairs and to start a business of his own. My parents were dead, and I lived with Uncle George. When this German advance began, my uncle and aunt thought fhe German armies would never get so far into France as this; so we remained when most of the town was flying westward. At last we sought flight in Uncle George's automobile, and my aunt forgot some jewels that had been in her family for two hundred years. My uncle needed petrol, and he stopped at a suburban garage to get some. Against my aunt's wishes, I ran back for the forgotten jewels. I had barely entered the house, when all at once the whole universe seemed to explode. A great shell had burst in the upper story. I found myself in the basement, bewildered; but otherwise I was unhurt.

"About sunset," she continued, "I looked cautiously out of the ruins above us, and saw you fall. There was a sudden roaring of German fire, and when it had died somewhat, I heard distant German shouts. They, too, had seen you fall. I had recognized your plane as a French plane, and I ran to help you when I saw you creeping out of the wreck. You were dazed.

He prevalled on her to lie down on the bed straw, with his coat for a pillow, and sleep, the chimber of a pillow, and sleep, when the clumbed carefully into the ruins above and made observations.

So far as he could see, the town was destred, and most of its buildings had been razed after the true German style. Because of the elevation of the town, he could see over the ground westward for miles, and his eyes were all to the town, he could see over the ground westward for miles, and his eyes were all to the town, he could see over the ground westward for miles, and his eyes were all to the town, he could see over the ground westward for miles, and his eyes were all to the town, he could see over the ground w it yet. When they find us, Mr. Elwood—as they surely will—before they can put hands on me—"

She paused, and he saw her lips tremble. For the moment speech failed her completely. Then she pointed to the automatic pistol he still wore at his hip, and with the other hand touched the center of her milk-white forehead.

"Save me in return," she choked. "Pay your debt to me. For I am weak, weak—I couldn't do it myself."

John Elwood, an aviator that had dared heights that few other aviators had dared, who had attacked single-handed pairs of Boche machines at dizzy altitudes, now went a clean white as he realized what she meant. He stepped to her, all the stout American manhood in him thoroughly awake, and put his arms about her as though to protect her.

"Don't worry, little girl," he said gently, "I will save you, but not in that way."

"But if you can't save me in any other way?" she asked, her eyes pleading.

He looked at her thoughtfully for a long minute. Unspeakable German atrocities in France and in Belgium were still fresh in his mind. Why did heaven permit such frightfulness? It did not stop at merely crucifying women, or bayoneting children through their stomachs. They were not isolated instances; it was all a part of the method of Teutonic warfare.

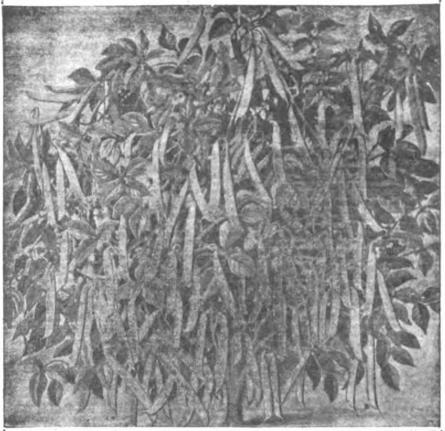

"I promise," he said.

That which she did next wrung tears from the eyes of Elwood. And from that moment on he loved her. She took one of his hands and kissed it, and pressed it to her heart.

"I thank God for you, John Elwood," she murmured.

He prevailed on her to lie down on the bed of straw, with his coat for a pillow, and sleep.

that he saw was to wait there in the basement and hope that the German lines would be forced to retreat. Even then, there was the ever present danger of being buried by an exploding shell.

Each of the two took a room in the basement for himself. Three days passed, and they still had food and water; nothing had happened save that Miss Lane had fallen in love with her protector quite as deeply as he had fallen in love with her protector quite as deeply as he had fallen in love with her feeling that existed between them, of course.

All search for Mrs. Lane's jewels had been futtle.

On the morning of the fourth day. Catherine went to Elwood with her face white, with a fear worse than the fear of death in her eyes. "Listent" she said in a low voice.

Elwood listened. He heard the voices of Germans were looting the ruined building above them. Elwood, too, was white. The young woman kerself drew his automatic from its holster and placed it in his hand.

"In a moment," she whispered, "they'll be here. Don't fall—— and don't miss——Good-by Good-by."

Before they realized what they were doing, they were kissing each other, Then he pressed her to him with one arm, wfille the other hand held the pistol ready.

But the Germans did not find the way down to the basement! And if John Elwood had tried for a hundred years to express his gratitude for that one thing, he would have falled.

A little later, Elwood climbed through the rubbish and debris, made his way to a point where he could see without being seen, and sat there watching. Soon he saw a German officer, all of the machine had come to a halt, the and the propelled completed the provider of the pains to the pains to the pains to the pains to the pain the feeling bear of the pain the feel him well, he was glad to note. But the Germans did not find the way down to the basement! And if John Elwood had tried for a hundred years to express his gratitude for that one thing, he would have failed. A little later, Elwood climbed through the rubbish and debris, made his way to a point where he could see without being seen, and sat there watching. Soon he saw a German officer, half drunk and alone, come swaggering down the street. Nobody else was in sight. It was then that the big idea occurred to Elwood.

When the officer had reached a point directly opposite the aviator, the latter-named called out in the excellent German of Heidelberg, to which city Elwood had gone for a part of his education:

"Come over here, Herr Major."

The Teuton stopped quickly, and one hand dropped to his pistol's butt.

"Quickly, Herr Major," Elwood went on. "It is most important."

The major came. After all, he wasn't afraid. Who but a native German could talk like that? He had now only a feeling of curiosity.

He entered the crumbling doorway confidently. He was a youngish man, handsome if one overlooked the brutality in his eyes, and he was dressed in a very smart uniform, with a scrupulously neat spiked helmet. When barely inside the doorway he stopped short, as the threatening black eye of an American automatic came into straight line with his heart.

"Oo what I tell you to do, major," said the American, "and little harm, if any, shall come to you. I promise you that on honor. And if you do not obey me, I will shoot you promptly. Now follow me."

He backed in the direction of the entrance to the basement. The German, his formerly rudy face now pale, followed. At the head of the stairs, Elwood complished it in quick time. Miss Lane smothered a cry of alarm.

"Nothing to fear, Catherine," said the aviator, smiling a reassuring smile with lips that were a triffe pale. "Please retire to your own apartment, but be ready to come when I call."

The girl disappeared. Elwood took one step toward his prisoner.

"Now, Herr Major," he said decisively, "you and I are going to exchange clothing. Be quick about it?"

The officer straightened and swore. "A disgrace for me! You may shoot me first, mein freund!"

"Then take off that coat," coldly smiled the

"Then také off that coat," coldly smiled the American. "I don't want to spoil it with bullet holes."

The German paled. "I will make the exchange," he decided.
It was carried out within a few minutes. When it was over, Elwood bound the officer hand and foot with strips torn from a portiere, bound a thick cloth around his head and in his mouth to prevent his making an outery, called Miss Lane and gave her the German's pistol.
"If he tries to escape," said the aviator, "kill him. I expect to be back within one hour."
With that, he was gone. The uniform and Miss Lane took away his weapons; then she and her saviour climbed into the seats of the airplane, and Elwood faced the German again. "Start the propeller, Herr Borfeld. And when you have done that, go to the ruins of the house of Mr. George Lane and search for the officer whose clothing I wear. You will find him in the basement, and be kind enough to give him the compliments of John Elwood, American, of the Lafayette Escadrille!"

Another moment and the machine was moving. It rose high, and sailed over the German lines and to safety, though they did land with some difficulty because of the enemy machine. And almost the first persons to greet them were George Lane and his wife, who had thought themselves sure of Catherine's having perished with the explosion of the great shell in their house.

A week later, Catherine wore a diamond ring on her engagement finger.

How to Grow Garden Shrubs

Copyright, 1918, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

LOWERS are always wonderful in the garden, yet a garden without a few good shrubs is by no means as attractive as it can be made. A great many people complain that they cannot make garden shrubs grow. The reason is that the shrubs are not planted properly. As with nearly everything else in this world, the right sort of a start means much.

You may be sure that if you patronize reliable nurseries you will secure good shrubs. They may not look very thrifty when they reach you, but, properly planted they are certain to grow. When you receive them they are packed in moss and covered with burlap, and one great trouble is that the average amateur gardener at once rips open the burlap as soon as they come, to see what they look like. He leaves the roots exposed to the air until he gets ready to set out the shrubs. Then he digs a hole, crowds in the roots, pours a pall of water over the earth and calls the job done.

Now trees are living creatures and they need to be robust to endure such treatment. Pretty often they die. They were not given a square dad good shrubs at the worked in the provide additional plant food, but worked in to provide additional plant food, but worked in the roots. should therefore be planted thickly, and some for the pound to be robust to endure such treatment. Pretty often they die. They were not given a square deal. If they live, they are likely to be spindly and frail.

Most failures are due to one of three causes or to a combination of them all—letting the roots dry out, failure to cut back the top, and too deep planting. The shrubs may be kept safely for several days in the original package, if the roots are not exposed. If they are to be kept for some time before being planted, a trench should be dug and the plants set in it, very close together, and slightly inclined toward the direction from which the sun shines, the roots being covered with earth. This is called "theoling in and serves to keep the roots moist."

If there are several shrubs to be handled at planting time, it is well either to set them in a barrel of water or dip the roots in a puddle of liquid mud, which will cake them over and prevent their being dried out by the wind.

Many amateurs get poor results because of their curious mania for deep planting. Generally, a ring on the stalk will show where the plant stood in reference to the surface of the ground when in the nursery. Let it go into the earth just deep enough to hide this ring under half an inch of soil.

Lifting a plant usually deprives it of half its root growth, and the top should be cut back accordingly. It is just as well, in fact, to have rather less top than root at the beginning. Cutting back to this extent may seem a drastic measure, but it is really of vital importance. The roots themselves should be trimmed smooth at thends, if they have been broken off, and should be carefully spread out in a wide circle. This means, naturally, that a wide hole should be dug. To get the best results, the soil should be thoroughly

Duck Raising on the Increase

UCKS are coming to the fore with a rush in this country, and I predict that within another year America will have followed the lead of England and Australia, and duck farming will be as common as chicken farming, as the demand for eatable birds and eggs has increased steadily for the last five years, and judging from the letters I have received during the last few months asking for information about duck raising, our readers are awakening to the fact that there is money in ducks.

The first point for the beginner to grasp is the difference in breeds, for not all ducks are money-makers. There are quite a number of breeds, the principal of which are Pekin, Aylesbury, Rouen, Crested, Indian Runner and Muscovy.

The Pekins are creamy white with reddish money-makers. There are quite a number of breeds, the principal of which are Pekin, Aylesbury, Rouen, Crested, Indian Runner and Muscovy.

The Pekins are creamy white, with reddish orange shanks and feet, and weigh at maturity, drakes, eight pounds; ducks, seven. The Aylesbury are pure white, shanks and feet light orange; drake, nine pounds; duck, eight. The Rouen drake's head and neck are green, with a white collar. Body, ashy gray, mixed with green. Breast, purplish brown; underbody, steel gray. Weight, nine pounds. The ducks are principally light brown, pencilled with darker brown and green; weight, eight pounds. The Crested are pure white ducks with pronounced white crests or topknots. Drake weighs seven pounds, duck, six. There are two varieties of Muscovy—the pure white, with a red wrinkled skin on their faces, and orange shanks and feet; the colored Muscovies have black and white heads, with the same odd, wrinkled skin on their faces as the white ones. Their backs are blue-black, sometimes broken with white feathers; shanks and feet, from yellow to dark red color, or even black. Drakes, ten pounds; ducks, eight.

There are also two varieties of Indian Runner ducks—one pure white, the other light fawn and white or gray and white. The fawn and white are the most popular among breeders. The side of the face should be fawn or gray; throat, pure white; breast and shoulders, fawn or gray, running to white; tail, fawn or gray. Brakes weigh four and a half pounds; ducks, four.

When it comes to market purposes, we narrow down to Pekins and Indian Runners; Pekins being preferred, in most markets, for table birds; and they are certainly the most profitable for that purpose, because they grow up very quickly, being ready for market when six or nine weeks old, when they will weigh from four to six pounds appece, if they have been well fed and kept in yards away from streams and ponds; and in the wholesale market they bring about eighteen cents a pound.

As egg producers, Indian Runner ducks are the wonders of the po wholesale market they bring about eighteen cents a pound.

As egg producers, Indian Runner ducks are the wonders of the poultry world, for they have outstripped all records. One breeder in Indiana, who had three hundred and fifty birds, affirms that on January 26 he commenced shipping eggs for hatching, and sent out 36,000 by July 25th, and that each duck (the stock consisted of three hundred ducks and fifty drakes) averaged ten dollars a year, the average yield being ninetynine eggs for each bird in one hundred and eight days. In New Zealand a two years' contest was conducted, one duck laying five hundred and twelve eggs in twenty-three months, and was still laying an egg a day, even though she was moulting. They are strong, healthy, easy to raise, develop very rapidly, and will, under good conditions, commence to lay before they are five months old.

There are many points in favor of duck culture, as they are free from lice roup, scabby legs and raise, develop very rapidly, and will, under good donditions, commence to lay before they are five months old.

There are many points in favor of duck culture, as they are free from lice, roup, scabby legs and other diseases so common to chickens.

These ducks are hardy and vigorous, and as their chief characteristics are their laying qualities, they have come to stay, and the one who gives them special attention will realize a good profit from them in the future.

Running water is not at all necessary to their development, but they must have plenty of clean, fresh water for drinking purposes. They are great foragers, and find a part of their food when given free range, but they can be successfully handled in two-foot quarters. A two-foot fence is sufficient to inclose them.

One of the secrets of success is to start with pure bred stock, for blood will tell in ducks the same as in other poultry. Having a good foundation, it is wonderful what can be done with a small number. By this method you get experience as your flock increases.

Keep one drake for every six or eight ducks, and fatten the rest for market when nine or ten weeks old. At this age we dress them and sell to private parties for fifty to sixty cents each. Some work, but it pays. But eggs are what you work for, and the flock should be large enough to enable you to market them by the case.

To get winter eggs, laying ducks should have an inclosed house, but after May they do better if allowed to run out all the time, but should be penned at night until nine o'clock the next morning, when they will be through laying for the day. The eggs are larger than hens' eggs, and they bring from five to ten cents more per dozen than hens' eggs in the commercial market.

Laying ducks should be fed a damp mash composed of bran, shorts, corn meal and beef scrap twice each day, with whole corn at night. Never vegetable food or they can't produce eggs. You can buy dried beef scraps specially prepared for poultry. Cabbage, beets or sprouted oats are the best winter greens. Failing these, chop clover or alfalfa hay quite fine, steam it for several hours, and mix with ground grain for mash.

N. G.—I cannot recommend brooders or publish dresses in this column. Look through the advertiseats and write to the different people for their price ments and write to the different people for their price lists.

A. F. T.—You certainly did have a disastrous experience with your incubator, and also with the henhatched chicks. As your neighbor had the same poor results when she tried the incubator in her cellar, and with eggs from different stock, the trouble cannot lie with your hens or cellar. Are you sure that the eggs were turned and aired night and morning from the second to the eighteenth day? The heat in the egg chamber should be kept as near 103 as possible all through the hatch until the eggs commence to pip, when it may run up to 104½ or even 105, but it must not drop below 103. Read answer to L. K., and refer to "Poultry Farming for Women" in January COMPORT. The loss of chickens which were hatched and brooded by hens must have been due to mismanagement after the chicks were hatched, as the hundred chickens from the eggs you bought died in the same way. Were the coops and hens free from vermin? Were the coops on dry ground, and did you keep the chicks in until the dew was off from the grass in the morning? Please refer to the February number of COMPORT. It will help you about brooders and feed for little chicks.

B. E. M.—The plans you have made for altering a chicken house are so good that I cannot offer any improvements, unless it is about using four or five thicknesses of building paper at a dollar a roll, and over that rubberized roofing at $2.25 a roll. The building paper would be a needless expense. The strips which you intend putting over the cracks on the outside and the building paper will make the house quite warm enough, but the muslin screens before the windows will allow a good circulation of air, so that the ventilator can be omitted. As you were troubled with gapes last season, I advise you to have the ground where the brood coops stood given a heavy dressing of fresh lime and then plowed and planted to some quick growing crop, for the germ of the gapeworm is carried by earth worms that inhabit the soil that has been overcharged with poultry droppings, and your only way to eradicate they trouble is to purify the soil. If it is not possible to have the ground plowed up, keep the brood coops and young chicks as far away from the old stand as possible. It will save you a lot of trouble and the poor little chicks the uncomfortable experience of having the worms fished out of their throats. Better let some of the oats deyelop, and have them threshed out, then you will be able to make up a well-balanced ration from some of the things you purpose raising. Oats, millet and cane seed, mixed, will give you good scratching feed and can also be used for night feed, until cold weather, when all hens should have whole corn for supper, and cracked corn should have whole corn for supper, and cracked corn should have whole corn for supper, and cracked corn should have whole corn for supper, and cracked corn should have whole corn for supper, and cracked corn should have whole corn for supper, and cracked corn should have whole corn for supper, and cracked corn should have whole corn for supper day than risk using a lamp.

H. N.—Egg eating is a bad habit, usually starting through the egg being broken accidentally and the birds finding out what good food it contains. Once started, the whole flock soon acquires the taste and lay in wait for every egg that is laid. The best remedy is to place the nests about two feet above the ground, with the opening facing the swall, and not more than two feet from it. Buy some china eggs, put one in each nest and throw two or three in the middle of the floor. The birds will spend much time picking at them, and, as they will get no satisfaction, soon tire of the habit, especially if the eggs from the nests are gathered several times a day for a few weeks.

N. S. H.—As I suppose you know the best in the weeks.

N. S. H.—As I suppose you know, the heat in the egg chamber of an incubator should be kept as near 103 all through the hatch as possible. During the second week, or at any time up to the eighteenth day, it would not spoil the hatch if the heat went as low as 60 for a short time, say an hour at the longest, but if it ran up to 105 it would be dangerous; over that, fatal. Frequent and severe changes in temperature invariably produce crippled or blind chicks. Running an incubator too low, or cooling the eggs too long each day, prolongs the hatch and weakens the chicks. Running it too high, or not cooling and airing, hurts the hatch and has exactly the same effect in weakening the chicks. You will find it better to make a fireless brooder exactly as described in the February COMPORT. A lantern in a large box would not furnish sufficient warmth to keep the chicks comfortable at night, and if they get chilled it means bowed trouble and loss. I should think you might be able to exchange corn for eats without any extra expense. Read answer to B. E. M. in this issue about making up balanced rations.

C. W. S.—Your losses last year were certainly very help you. Kaffir corn is usually to be bought at the large grain stores. About ducks, see the department this month.

G. H. K.—The birds were suffering from coccidiosis, which is contagious and may have been introduced into your flock by a new fowl, pigeons, wild birds, rats or mice. It is caused by a very minute form of animal life. Birds may appear dull, sleepy and lose weight, or they may die suddenly without showing any outward signs of the disease. Kill all birds that look sickly or suspicious and burn the bodies. Clean up the chicken house and have the yards plowed or dug up. Add four grains of catechu to every quart of drinking water for the remaining birds and give a mash made by moistening ground grain with castor oil once a week for three weeks.

Chicago, March 1.—Incubators and brooders have been exempted from railway embargoes. The farmers and poultrymen of America whose early orders have been held up at points of shipments will now get their machines without interruption, and those who have held back their orders because of the rail embargo situation can breathe easy and get their orders in quickly, with the knowledge of uninterrupted shipment.

Playing Hide and Seek for a Bride

Playing Hide-and-Seek for a Bride

The chase is the chief characteristic of a wedding among the Koraks of Siberia. It takes place in the family home, which consists of a large tent made into many compartments. In these the two principals of the drama play a modified version of our own game of hide-and-seek.

In the center of the spacious tent the guests assemble. Much hot tea is drunk while one of the number grouped about the fire, beats zeal-ously upon a drum. After bringing in a bunch of willows and placing one in each room, the drummer breaks into a loud song which increases in volume at the entrance of the bridal pair.

At the most intense moment of the drumming and singing a relative of the bride signals to her. Fleet as a doe, she springs into the first compartment. The hopeful bridegroom follows with his fastest pace. If he fails to overtake the maiden, he will wear a bachelor's frown until two years pass, when he may try again.

Being a bridegroom among the Koraks is an ordeal, for in each of the rooms a woman with willow shoots awaits the matrimonial candidate and lashes him freely when he enters. Other women throw reindeer skins before him. He therefore travels a path of stumbling-blocks and entanglements.

The girl may legally refuse her suitor at the last moment. The hindrances to the groom are sufficient to prevent him from capturing the bride; who goes rapidly through all the compartments, for she is neither whipped nor tangled in skins. In the last section she is supposed to wait for him; but, if she suddenly changes her mind, she may give him the mitten by emerging alone.

A Korak groom, however, rarely worries about such a possibility nor resents the beating he gets

A Korak groom, however, rarely worries about such a possibility nor resents the beating he gets from the women who wield the willows. He knows the whipping and the dropping of the reindeer skins before him are merely make-believe and that a Korak maiden invariably waits in the last compartment.

AN ELEPHANT'S BREAKFAST.—The British Forest Department of India uses elephants for piling and arranging logs at the timber depots. In the Sungam district the huge pachyderms are turned loose every evening and they do their own foraging for green fodder and juicy shoots of bamboo. Each morning the mahouts or keepers rustle out and round up their charges. Then they march the animals to the nearest river or stream, command them to lie down in the water, and give them a real-for-sure bath, minus soap and other luxuries.

An elephant does not object to his bath, for he knows that breakfast follows. He probably regards the meal as a reward for his good behavior; so it is, for his allowance would be reduced or not given him if he became stubborn or unruly.

The breakfast consists of one maund (or twenty-four pounds) of rice for each elephant. The diners arrange themselves around a mat which suffices as a table. Then the cook, walking on the mat, serves the rice in the proper order.

The elephants exhibit excellent table manners. The cook makes the boiled food into balls as large as a man's head and gives four or five to each animal. As the cook lifts each ball, the bulky diner opens wide his mowth to receive the huge morsel. Elephants, unlike hogs, eat quietly.

When he threw away the stump she was sitting quite motionless, but she was dry-eyed.

At dinner he looked at her covertly and wondered why on earth she wore a black gown. It made her eyes look dark and gave the red and white of her face an unearthly clearness.

"She looks awfully old, somehow," the boy thought uneasily. "I hope she doesn't go and make another break tonight. She looks—" even to himself he did not say "desperate." After all, he knew no reason why she should be.

to himself he did not say "desperate." After all, he knew no reason why she should be.

But when he went into the drawing-room, after putting Mr. Jacobs to bed, something caught at his heart. Neither Ravenel nor Captain Gordon were there; and all the women but the duchess had a furtive look.

"Beasts, women!" Sir Thomas retreated as suddenly as he had entered, determined to fetch his sister to her senses, or die. But at an open window in the hall something moving outside in the moonlight caught his eye, and checked his hasty walk. He hung out recklessly, and saw two figures disappear into the shrubbery, a man and a woman in a black dress!

"She's mad," said the boy, with something like a sob in his throat. And turned round to see Ravenel and Levallion looking at him.

"I—I felt dizzy," he stammered, scarcely believing his eyes; for if this were Ravenel, who was that outside?

"I don't wonder." said Levallion cheerfully. "In another minute I'd have hauled you in by the legs. Come and play blind man's buff with the rest of the idiots I have taken into my house."

"I think I'll take a stroll. It's hot in there. Where," in pure blank desperation, "is Gordon?"

"Gone to bed. He starts at seven," and just as if he were sorry for the girl who stood by in silence, Lord Levallion did not look at her as he followed her into the lights, the scent, the circle of women—enlightened by Lady Gwendolen—that made his own drawing-room a place of torment.

Sir Thomas, in his thin shoes and no cap, circle of women—enlightened by Lady Gwendolen—that made his own drawing-room a place of torment.

Sir Thomas, in his thin shoes and no cap, slipped unnoticed out into the moonlight, pure curiosity his only motive. The woman had looked like a lady, a lady's long dress and voluminous evening cloak had showed plainly where she stood in the clear moonlight. The night was bright as day, the air warm, almost balmy, as if the moon had brought back summer when the sunset chill was gone.

in the clear moonlight. The night was bright as day, the air warm, almost balmy, as if the moon had brought back summer when the sunset chill was gone.

"I don't believe it was any old kitchen-maid last night," he thought, as he followed the path by which the mysterious man and woman had vanished. "I could see very well, but I believe it was, well—whoever it was now!" rather feebly. No one had told him of the lady who had come to ask for Gordon, and he had never chanced to pass that new bungalow that had given Levalion such an unpleasant surprise. Against his will there cropped up in his mind those old stories of Levallion; if one half of them were true, there must be several women ready to eat their hearts by staring in at his respectable married windows! Sir Thomas hoped devoutly there was not going to be any fuss. The path led him from the gardens into the park, across the grass among the deer, and into a thick tangled wood. But the boughs were leafless, and the moon showed him that the path went on still, a dark thread between the dead bracken under the crowding trees. It wound on and on, and the night silence of the wood somehow quieted Tommy Annesley. Through the arching boughs overhead he could see the cloudless indigo sky; the moon peeped at him in uncanny suddenness from different directions as the path twisted. He stepped more and more cautiously, as if the noise of a breaking twig under his feet would have been a crime in the strless quiet of the wood.

"This is rot," he thought, stopping once. "No one can be here," but something drove him on again even while he called himself a fool. The curious awe that was on him deepened till, without knowing it, he was moving noiseless as a midnight thlef walking a strange road. With a queer thrill he pulled up standing; slipped, before the moon caught the tellale black and white of his clothes in the surrounding dimness, behind the trunk of a great girtled oak. The path had stopped, as suddenly as the trees and undergrowth it ran through. Before him, short gras

The oak-tree was between him and the moon. If there was any one beside it, they were blotted out against its thick bulk of darkness. But what was that clear, steady glitter on the rock? A crystal, starry glitter that in one spot turned to worn gold?

worn gold?

A quick rustling behind him made him turn with apprehensive annoyance. No one likes to be caught inspecting the world from behind a tree. But the rustling was Mr. Jacobs.

"Lie down!" whispered Sir Thomas savagely. "What silly fool let you out?" He grabbed the humble Jacobs—who had been vastly proud of escaping from bed and scenting him out—in his arms, that he might not bark; and suddenly felt that he was glad that the dog had come. For the place was ghostly.

"It's impossible, though, to lug him and edge round a bit nearer!" he thought, deeply interested in that glitter which was no business of his. "By George!"

A man had come from against the tree, hoisted sound like the howl of a wild beast.

Mr. Jacobs felt he could not bear it. He gave a low, shivery growl, and before Sir Thomas knew it, was on the ground, running like a wiry white devil straight to that picnic-party that sat unawares. He ran quick—that was what froze Tommy's voice in his throat. If he had barked it would not have mattered what he rushed at, but a silent Jacobs was another thing, as dogs and sets know.

and cats knew.

Before Sir Thomas could get clear of his hidingplace, the need was over. Jacobs had flown straight at the man's legs, where they hung over the rock, but with a wild leap his prey had sprung to the top of the mighty slab, where he stood upright, never making the slightest motion toward the woman beside him, whose long cloak had hung over his memaced legs. Tommy heard Jacobs fall back heavily as he missed his spring; saw him pick himself up, trot deliberately back to his master, slowly and with puzzled growling, as of a dog who had been deceived.

The boy stooped and took something from the more active than plaintively asking: "What shall

The answer is "Do? Why, drive them out!"

fects, and our job, now, is to get right to work and drive them away.

It's really quite easy, girls—just takes a little bit of "keeping at it." To begin with, sallow complexions come from inactive organs—liver, stomach, bowels. And your particular task, therefore, if you want to get rid of the yellow skin, is to make them active. Exercise will do this, and you should get at least half an hour a day of vigorous exercise—the kind which exercises waist and abdomen muscles.

Then, help out your digestion by the choice of your foods, and the manner of preparing them, and, most important of all, the manner of eating them. If you will chew every mouthful of food until it is fluid before swallowing it, you will never have one hour's trouble with indigestion—you couldn't have if you tried. Your stomach will have such a delightfully easy time, that it will grow strong and well, and it will extract from the food you eat every particle of nourishment, whereas in the past you have failed to digest your food properly, so have not gotten what it had to give you in strength, flesh or energy.

digest your food properly, so have not gotten what it had to give you in strength, flesh or energy.

You can't have a clear skin if the eliminative functions of the body are not active—the pores of the skin must be kept open, and the bowels regular. A daily bath, even just a quick sponge, and daily exercise, will take care of the pores; exercise, food and liquids will take care of the bowels. Don't forget my ancient slogan of "Drink eight to ten glasses of water a day"—lobey it! Put half-a-dozen prunes to soak in a tumbler of warm water every night, and drink the juice and eat the prunes the next morning—they are better as a corrective than medicine. Eat apples, raw, baked and made into apple sauce, sliced oranges, grapefruit, honey, spinnach when you can get it, bran bread, stewed or pressed figs, pineapple. These foods will act as vigorous correctives, and if you see that they are included in your meals at least twice a day, to supplement the water you drink and the exercise you take, I can warrant you, that the days will be few indeed before the yellow tinge will be gone from your cheeks, and the dullness from your eyes, while plunples will have fled in dismay.

It's worth following, girls—this advice of mine. Try it, and here's good luck to you.

BROWN EYRS.—Blackheads are caused by dirt lodging in the pores. The way to get rid of them is to keep the face scrupulously clean. Use a complexion brush—of camel's hair, which is soft—and scrub the face with that at night. A daily bath of the entire person stimulates the pores to throw off all secretions and is, therefore, a good way to help get rid of the blackheads. Rub the skin well, after a bath. If it is not convenient to take a tub bath daily, you can give yourself a quick sponge bath, standing on a bath towel. Scrupulous cleanliness will help the condition of your scalp, also, for the health of your hair depends upon the entire body. Shampoo the hair once in two or three weeks probably two weeks, in your case. I have given directions many times for making a shampoo jelly to use; do not rub soap on the hair. Be careful about rinsing and drying. Every night massage the scalp with the flat of the finger tips, moving the scalp back and forth on the skull. This stimulates the circulation of blood and helps to nourish the hair and strengthen it. Look after your general health, especially your bowels. Drink lots of water. About the bust, which you say is small for your age, you do not tell me its size. You should not have a very large bust, being only five feet, three inches tall. Any arm and chest exercise will develop the bust—or will reduce a too fat bust. Funny—isn't it?—how exercise works two ways; that is because exercise wears away just fat, but develops muscle. Try the various exercises lately given in COMFORT, and practice them at least twice a day for ten or fifteen minutes. Why try to get a much larger bust? Slim busts are very fashionable, these days, and many a society woman would no doubt sigh for yours!

Lilly.—If your hair is falling out and splitting at the ends, it is not getting enough nourishment. Your whole body probably needs attention. See answer to "Brown Eyes." Brush your hair nightly, from fitty to one hundred strokes. Get plenty of outdoor exercise, sleep with your windows open, select sensible foods, avoiding fried foods, but eating plenty of fresh fruits and green vegetables. Do not shampoo oftener than once in three weeks, if your hair is dry. Be sure to massage scalp nightly. You may occasionally massage in a little oil. Use a medicine dropper, and run down a part in the hair, then rub oil gently in; do the same with another part; and with another; then massage all over the scalp, starting at the oily parts and moving to oiled surfaces. In this way a few drops of oil can be spread over the scalp without leaving it greasy and unpleasant. Be careful not to drop the oil on the kgir, nor to touch the hair itself with oily fingers—keep the fingers pressed just against the scalp and massage until every particle of the oil is absorbed. Do not brush that night, but brush lightly in the morning. The important thing for you to remember, however, is that if you want beautiful healthy hair, you must have a healthy body, bathed daily, fed properly, exercised regularly, and every function, such as those of stomach and bowels, taken care of as it should be.

Wild Rose.—You say you cannot shampoo in the winter because you are not very strong. Your hair will certainly fail out, as you say it is doing, if you do not shampoo it, and your dandruff of which you complain comes from no other cause. You cannot possibly suffer any harm from shampooing your hair, whether in winter or summer. Better get at it at once. Do not under any circumstances use a dry shampoo, that will only make matters worse and you will lose more hair than you have lost already. If you will prepare a soap jelly by shaving white soap into boiling water—half a cake to a quart—dissolving over the stove and setting away to cool and will use that to rub your hair with, after wetting it, you will find it excellent. Lather thoroughly, and rub, then rinse: lather again, rub thoroughly, rinse; lather a third time, rub, and rinse, rinse. Pour pitcher after pitcher of very warm water over your scalp, if you have not a bath spray, and finally dip your head in a tub or large pan and submerge it many times. Finally rinse the hair with cool water, then dry in the sun

SKIN LIKE LILY IN A FEW DAYS

How to Make Hair Start Growing at Once, The Secret of a Youthful Face, and Other Ways to Quick Beauty.

To Grow Hair in a Few Days.

OU can now make your hair start growless quickly and in great profusion by a single home method, filling out bald spots, stop falling of hair and give your tresses a splendid shown of vigor and health. If your hair is this, breaks or falls out easily on brushing, if it is short and dull-looking, you'll notice a very remarkable difference in a few days by making up at home in a few moments a mixture of one ounce of beta-quinol (which you can obtain at any drug store for fifty cents) and a half pint each of boay rum and water, or with a full pint of witchhazel instead of the bay rum and water, if desired. This makes the most economical hair grower and gives unusual results.

Complexion Like a Rose

This is a positive way to get rid of red spots, muddiness and sallowness, freckies and other blemishes, giving as queenly a tint and purity to the skin as you could ever wish for. This is done by the simple mixture of one ounce of zintone, two tablespoonfuls of glycerine and a pint of water. The zintone can be obtained for fifty cents at any drug store. This makes more complexion cream than you can get, at an equal price, in prepared form, and is extremely effective. Try it.

Brings Youth to the Face.

Wrinkles? Worry about them no longer. Try this unusually effective way and you will be able to make your face look years younger. Crow's feet, wrinkles, sagging cheeks, lines of age, have you any of these? Try this, it makes the skin more vigorous and plump: At any drug store you can obtain a two-ounce package of eptol for fifty cents. Mix this with a tablespoonful of glycerine in a half-pint of water. It will do the work.

Let Hair and Scalp Breathe.

A perfectly clean scalp makes hair grow more lux-uriantly. A teaspoonful of eggol dissolved in a half cup of water makes an extraordinary hair and scalp wash, dissolving away all accumulations and dandruff, outclasses soap and water. For twenty-five cents you get enough eggol at any drug store to give a dozen or more shampoos.

Have You Superfluous Hair?

Dissolve them away,—it is the only way. Don't burn them off, irritating the skin, as is often done. Apply some sulfo solution to the halrs, which will cost a dol-lar at any drug store, and every hair, even on delicate skins, will shrink and dissolve away, leaving the skin free from redness, delightfully smooth and white.

For Arm-Pit Perspiration.

For excessive and unnatural arm-pit perspiration, there is nothing better than hydrolized tale, which costs fifty cents at the drug store. It is applied just like talcum, is scientifically prepared and keeps the arm-pits dry-fresh, prevents fading of garments, discomfort and embarrassment. Besides, it destroys all body odors. It is splendid in results.

shut jaws. He had seized the woman's cloak. "Not her, or she'd have yelled!" he thought with relief. And then as the man moved, a living silhouette against the cold moonshine, Sir Thomas Annesley knew him.

"I wonder," he thought, sick and shaken, "if the moon's made me crazy?" He made a step toward the pair on the rock—and oh! if he had only gone close to them—and then drew back. It was no business of his. But the thing was so unpleasant that he held his tongue about it.

CHAPTER XXIII. THE DARK GLASS.

"Adrian's gone," said Lady Levallion to herself as she woke the next morning. She knew she ought to be glad of it, thankful that he was no longer in Levallion's house; for which reason, probably, she dragged herself out of bed and thought with blank loathing of the empty day before her; of the women who must be amused; of Levallion, who must not see she missed any one.

probably, she dragged herself out of bed and thought with blank loathing of the empty day before her; of the women who must be amused; of Levallion, who must not see she missed any one.

"I might as well pretend not to care if Tommy died!" she said bitterly. "For it's just the same. If I know anything about Adrian, he will never see me again, of his own accord."

There was a letter on the plate at breakfast, and for one half second she thought he might have written a bare half-dozen words of farewell to the woman he had meant to live and die with. But the common envelope, the scrawled address, undeceived her. It was a begging letter, and she opened it listlessly, and hardly noticed some scraps of torn pasteboard that fell out of it. But as she read the soiled half-sheet of common writing, Gwendolen Brook nudged Colonel Scarsdale. Lady Levallion's face was a dull crimson from forehead to chin.

Even Levallion noticed it, as she stuffed the letter into her pocket and gathered up those fallen bits of pasteboard. Noticed, too, that the very instant breakfast was over, she went to her own sitting-room, scarcely waiting to hear the plans for the day. Yet it was not the letter that had brought the blood to her face. That was from the Umbrella, as Tommy had prophesied; and the news in it was late for the market, except that it gave chapter and verse of what Ravenel had only guessed at.

Lady Annesley had turned Adams out, she had lost her savings, was at a farmhouse half a mile off, with no money and—she thought—dying. Would Miss Ravenel come to her, as she could not die with her wickedness on her mind? It was she who had warned Lady Annesley of that wild dream of marriage with Adrian Gordon, she who had shown him Ravenel's torn Sunday frock on the day you was out," it wound up. "I send it so you may see it is true. Her ladyship cut his ring off your neck that day, you know of, and gave me five pounds to post it to him. I kept the torn card just to have something to hold over her. But she didn't care, and she turned me

Gordon."

"I won't go," thought Ravenel, laying down the letter.

"She always hated me. She's only doing this to pay Sylvia out. I couldn't see her. I won't let any one tell me things—or pity me," but even as she said it she knew she would go. She was never a good hater, and the woman was dying—or thought so.

She laid the scraps of card on the table and pieced them together. There was one bit gone. The Umbrella must have left it with her ladyship's rubbish-basket. But she made out the penciled, pitifully-guarded scrawl, in spite of the missing corner.

"Dear Miss Annesley"—it ran—"how have I dissed you? Didn't you get my letter? sail tomorrow, but after mess.

"Forgive her!" said Ravenel, making sense well enough, for she knew the missing words must have been, "I'll come back tonight" and "meet me," because of Adrian's story of his useless waiting in the garden. I can't forgive her. I don't believe I ever forgave anything in all my life, or forgot, either. I'll send her money, but I never want to see her as long as I live."

A sound at the door startled her into saying. "Come in" before she swept the patched card off the table. It was only Levallion, but his face (Continued on page 13.)

grew gray as he saw her put her arm sharply over the torn card, the scrawled letter. Something that had been on his lips died there, and there flashed up in his mind, like an instantaneous photograph, the memory of Adrian falling in a dead faint under the trees, and the little inarticulate, dreadful cry with which Ravenel had sprung toward him.

"Are you coming out?" he said. "They are waiting for you," and he went away without waiting for an answer.

Her back had been to the door. She had not seen his face, nor could she dream that outside in the lonely passage he stood for one instant, and hid his worn face in his hands. The next second he threw into a jar of flowers a scrap of penciled card Lady Gwendolen had said sweetly was his wife's; "Lady Levallion had dropped it."

"It's not very valuable," Levallion had asswered, glancing at the scrap, and taking in both sides of it with the quickness habitual to him. But now, when he had seen her poring over some fragments exactly like it, he cursed his quick eyes and Lady Gwendolen. For on one side of the quarter-card was "Gordon—Hussars." On the other, "I'll come back tonight. Meet me. "A. G.'" No wonder Ravenel had turned red and torn it up.

"Quid pro quo!" said Lord Levallion slowly.

the other, "I'll come back tonight. Meet me. 'A. G.'" No wonder Ravenel had turned red and torn it up.

"Quid pro quo!" said Lord Levallion slowly. "It's my turn now, I suppose, having taken a wife instead of borrowing one. But I don't think there'll be any meeting!" He straightened himself, wearily, and went out shooting as if his heart was not like lead. Somehow, he had lacked either courage or inclination to tell Ravenel what he knew. And she never dreamed he would have listened to the silly, childish story that meant nothing now, except to her and Adrian.

She sent some money to Adams, with a carefully written note to the effect that she knew of nothing she had to forgive, since nothing Lady Annesley or her maid had done had caused her any harm. It was a lie, of course, but there was nothing else Levallion's wife could say. She breathed freer when it was gone.

But when the shooting-party came home, Levallion's face somehow worried her. All the softness was wiped off it, and he talked as the old Levallion had been wont to, not the new. She waited for him in her dressing-room till the gong went for dinner, but he never came. And when he passed her in the drawing-room on his way to give his arm to the duchess, she stopped him. "Levallion," she whispered, her hand on his arm, "what's the matter? Aren't you well?" "Perfectly, thank you," he said quietly, but he never looked at her. A sudden gust of wicked femper shook him like a leaf; if they had been a snake—to wish the next second that he had kissed her before the whole room.

For as he looked straight before him he met Lady Gwendolen's amused, insolent eyes, and knew that all he knew she knew also; and his knowledge of it besides. His lordship went into dinner with the cheerful conviction that at forty-seven he had made a fool of himself—before the people! And it did not soften his heart to his wife.

A curious second light, born of strained nerves, made him slip away from the men some ten minutes after the women had left the dining-seven he had made a 1000 of himself—betore the people! And it did not soften his heart to his wife.

A curious second light, born of strained nerves, made him slip away from the men some ten minutes after the women had left the diningroom. And crossing the hall was what he had expected, Ravenel in a hat and cloak, hurrying to a side door. Levallion's heart turned over. "Where are you going?" he said, very quietly. But his hand that caught her arm was not gentle. "To—out—the man's waiting—" she gasped, utterly terrified. "Levallion, don't look at me like that! It's a poor woman who sent for me this morning, and I wouldn't go. She's sent again today; she isn't dying, but she must see me. Thought I could go and be back before you came out of the dining-room. The woman knows me, she used to be Lady Annesley's maid. Look!" she held out a scrawled letter.

But no one knew better than Levallion that any letter might mean anything. He flickered it to the ground contemptuously.

"You have excellent reason to go and see your stepmother's maid." he said, careless that he betrayed ill-gotten knowledge. "But I fancy not tonight. You can drive over in the morning. Go back; take off those things; try and remember that if I was blind, other people are not." His low, furious voice carried farther than he knew, to where, on the turn of the staircase, Lady Gwendolen Brook stood breathless with laughter. Having seen the note delivered which sent her hostess from the drawing-room, it had been a delightful way of passing time to follow her. But she had not anticipated anything so amusing as this.

"Lewallion," said Ravenel, "you've no right to speak to me like this!" She threw off her cloak as this.

"Legallion," said Ravenel, "you've no right to speak to me like this!" She threw off her cloak and hat, and in all her white satins faced him paler than he. "Now, if the people you're afraid of do come," she whispered contemptuously, "they won't see anything to amuse them. But listen to me you shall. Even though I don't know what you are suspecting. Read those," With a gesture that was superb, she stooped for the letter he had dropped, put it and another into his hand; "then go outside and speak to the boy who's waiting to take me to the farmhouse, and then tell me, if you like, what you are thinking about me."

you said to Adrian the other night. I thought—"
"Here's the rest of it. It was six months ago I was to meet Adrian," she answered simply, for she knew what must have been on the card. "Did you think it was tonight? That I meant to meet another man, and steal out of your house to do it?"

"I feel like Othello, whom I always considered an egregious ass!" said Levallion slowly. "You see, it was just what I should have done, in Gordon's shoes." He slipped card and letter into his pocket.

To Ravenel's own surprise, the tears came to

To Ravenel's own surprise, the tears came to her eyes.

"You wouldn't," she cried, hotly. "Never! Why do you lie about yourself? You know nothing would make you do a thing like that."

"Nor you, either." She had never heard his voice so slow, so gentle. "I was a fool to doubt you. But I heard—the other night in the conservatory. I thought you cared still; that this—that when I cared at last, fate was having its revenge on mgt But I know better now!" Before she could stop him, he stooped and kissed the hem of her gown.

"Yon't," she gasped. "I've been wicked. I thought at first when I found out—for I never found out till I saw the ring they cut off his finger—and heard how he got it—that you had known all Sylvia did."

"My poor little child," he said, soberly. And then, wistfully: "You'll be as happy as you can, won't you? I—I try, you know."

"I'm happy, and I'll be happier," she answered bravely. "I—you know I like you, Levallion?"

With a gesture that was superb, she stooped for the letter he had dropped, put it and another into his hand; "then go outside and speak to the boy who's waiting to take me to the farmhouse, and then tell me, if you like, what you are thinking about me."

"As you like." He shrugged his shoulders, having in his day written many a letter that meant other things than were in it. But as he read, his face changed. There was nothing in those letters but their face value.

"Ravenel,"—in the stillness she heard the men rising in the dining-room, heard a quick rustle of silk on the stairs, and moved sharply round a corner so that she was out of sight. But Levallion was quicker. They stood now in the porch of the side door, as much alone as in Sahara, and she saw in the dim light that his hard mouth trembled.

"I have behaved abominably," he said with a humiliation that sat ill on him. "I—I found half a card this morning; and I heard something you said to Adrian the other night. I thought—"

A Soldier's Equipment.—The U. S. soldier in France carries a rifle which with bayonet affixed weighs exactly eleven pounds. Each soldier is supplied with one hundred cartridges in twenty clips. This ammunition weighs six pounds. The canvas belt with holders of brass weighs a pound and a half. The chilled steel helmet, made to turn a bullet at sixty feet, outweighs the belt by half an ounce. The shovel for trench-digging is exactly four ounces heavier than the helmet. A gas mask is part of a soldier's fighting equipment. He must also carry a first-aid package for use in emergency. He also has a tent cover, pole, and five pins, which, if combined with the same articles from another soldier's pack, will make a "dog-tent" suitable for two but no more. The total load the soldier carries, besides the clothes he wears, aggregates fifty-five pounds. His comfort kit contains a number of articles, such as meat can, spoon, cup, knife, fork, toothbrush and paste, canteen, rubber pouches, blanket, extra underwear, water and food.

The entire equipment has been figured out very minutely and carefully planned so that the American soldier will have a sufficiency of various articles and yet not be unduly impeded by the weight. Even at that, one can understand why infantrymen in quick action cast aside parts of their packs.

Until then she had crowded the New England part of her nature into the background, drugging it with work and inspiration. What would Noble say to her unwarrantable intrusion into his life, once his normal balance of mind was restored? The prospect of leaving this environment was intolerable, yet on what terms might she remain? Finally she succeeded in thrusting her apprehensions aside. There seemed to be room in her mind only for the glowing present. She was an opportunist, refusing to clutter her mind with forebodings.

Noble's mind functioned sluggishly for many days, and he lay, half dreaming, by the hour, too tirred to unravel the mystery which vaguely troubled him.

troubled him.

He knew Cecily, calling her Mignonette always, and her presence in his rooms soothed his restlessness. Hazily he wondered how she came to be there. Once he asked her and she explained that she was taking care of him. Mignonette a nurse? He did not remember that—not that it really mattered.

Once or twice the doctor referred to her as his wife. He did not protest, but, alone, he tried to focus his mind. Had he, then, married Mignonette? He could not remember, but he knew that sometimes in the past, when he had not been quite responsible, he had done odd things which he could not afterwards recall. He would ask her some time when his head did not ache. June came and with it the heat became oppressive. Noble was up now and alone for many hours of the day, for Cecily had resumed her studies. So soon as he could travel comfortably, he was going up to the Catskills. Some of his friends, notably Leah Belloc, had cottages at Sunset Park.

But first he must find out about Mignonette. He had been curiously reluctant to ask her, but now that he was quite strong there was no excuse for delay.

She came in while he was still thinking of her,

His nerves were raw with his weakness and he saw red.
"You'll come with me quietly and at once, or so help me God, I'll make you beg me on your knees to marry you!"
She shrank—but she went. Mechanically she replied to the questions put to her at City Hall. In dazed silence she drove with Noble to a deepnaved church and after he had found the clergyman, they were married, with the sexton and a servant from the rectory for witnesses.

Turning to speak to Cecily after the ceremony, Noble surprised a flaming radiance in her face, but, meeting his glance, the light vanished, leaving it as expressionless as a stained glass window from behind which the light had been suddenly extinguished.

elusive plot of his play. In his dangerous mood of unrest, he spent long hours with Leah Belloc.

One day in January, Cecily returned home early and retired behind a big screen, intending to work on one of her covers, but presently, feeling drowsy, she cuddled up in a big chair and slept.

The sound of voices finally roused her. Above the crackle of the fire, she recognized them instantly. The man was a dramatic critic, one of the sincere workers among Noble's friends and the only one who had ever regarded Cecily with friendly eyes. The woman was a blowsy writer of vers libre.

"I am so very sorry for Ranny," came the

"I am so very sorry for Ranny," came the arresting words,
"For Ranny?" the man queried, "And why, pray? How about Mrs. Ranny?"

"Ah! And do you think she is deserving of sympathy when she took advantage of his chivalry? We all know that that must have been the way she got him to marry her. And she is so crude."

"I should never think of calling her crude. She

"I should never think of calling her crude. She will go far, my friend."

"But men like Ranny want their genius decorative. And she is a frump, Jim. Have you noticed how ornamental Leah is becoming?"

The man replied with a significant sound of disgust and they rose to move on. Cecily, alone, emerged from her retreat and warmed her chilled hands thoughtfully.

"You're not going to Miss Belloc's studio party tonight?" Noble said to his wife a few days later.

"I believe I will."

Noble's flush did not escape her. "Have you anything to wear, Mignonette? Mayn't I—after all, you're my wife."

"Thank you, no."

Cecily's cloak revealed nothing as she descended the stairs that night and once in Leah's studio, Noble waited apprehensively for her appearance.

When she finally appeared, her husband did not, at first glance, recognize her. With her hair massed high the graceful slender lines of her and he was done—through with him until he had come to a sense of a man's responsibility.

No more money would be forthcoming. Let him get at his play and earn it. There was a fine irony in that. But merely to show him that he was willing to give him his chance, he would give him the use of his up-state farm for a year. It was well equipped but faultily managed. Let him see what he could do at a man's job. Or he could go on his own. In either case, it was plain that the discouraged man expected fail ure.

Cecily read the letter twice. "Hellish, isn't it?" Noble said when she laid it down. "However, he's a good old scout; all he needs is management. I am going up—"

"No!" Cecily broke in sharply.

He flushed a little under her steady gaze. "You're right," he said at last, his jaw squaring. "When do we start?"

"Start where, Mignonette?"

"No. But you must not go—must not relinquish your career."

"I climbed the little way I have gone on your ladder. I haven't been fair to you from the first. But I think I can help you up there. I am accustomed to the country, you know."

Without giving Noble a pause for withdrawal from the first fixed purpose of his life, Cecily took care of the details of their removal, and he, vacillating and depressed, felt a vague comfort in her comradeship.

There was promise of spring in the air when they reached the country. On southern slopes the

The Garden a Necessity Now

T is the patriotic duty of every family to raise not only the vegetables for their summer use but also an ample supply for the coming winter. This applies as well to city folks as to those who live on farms, provided the city dwellers have a back yard or rent a vacant lot,—many times can obtain for the asking.

Owing to the great shortage of food, which is a serious problem, a gardem is a necessity. The sooner a definite garden plan is made and the more carefully this plan is studied and worked out the greater will be the returns from the garden for commercial planting a better way is to first test seeds before planting, thereby calculating the amount of seed needed, without waste.

Transplanting Seedlings

In setting out plants such as tomatoes, cab bage, peppers, etc., it is a good plan to set boxes or pots in which they are planted out of doors in a sheltered place to become weathered before the plants are set in the garden. If the plants have been grown in the house or in a hothouse, a shady porch is a good place to put them during the warm part of the day. After a few days they may be moved into the sun, but should be carefully watched and kept moist or they may wilt or "cook down if the sun is too hot. The point is to get them gradually used to the sun and wind before setting them out in the garden.

When they are ready to transplant, wet the soil in the box thoroughly and take as much soil out with the roots as possible. If the garden soil is dry, it is a good plan to fill the hole, in which the plant is to be set, full of water and allow it to soak into the soil. After the plant is set with as little disturbance to the root system as possible, press the soil firmly around the plant, being careful that the roots are in direct contact with the soil. If this is not done, the air will dry out the roots and the plants will die. After the plants are set, rake a thin layer of very fine dry soil around them. This serves as a blanket and gives the moisture a chance to work up to the roots of the plant.

It is a good plan to pinch off some of the leaves of the plant is taken from the box. If potted plants are used, all that is necessary is to take dirt, plant and all from the pot, set in a hole in the ground and the plant is not disturbed at all, of course remembering to "weather" all plants before setting them out. If the garden soil is moist, plants may be set in the evening, but if not, it is better to set before or after a rain.

Dear Sir:

Hon

We believe that the flat rate of a cent a pound for second-class postage has been of inestimable benefit by facilitating and promoting the dissemination of knowledge, and that the magazines, which by means of this low flat rate have been enabled to build up a nation-wide circulation spreading information to the remotest nooks and corners of the land, constitute one of the greatest, most unifying and beneficent educational forces in the country. We earnestly protest against grading second-class postage on any zone rate basis as being class legislation aimed against the magazines and an unjust sectional discrimination against the people dwelling in parts remote from the large centers of population.

Therefore, we respectfully request you to exert your influence and give your vote in Congress in favor of the repeal of the zone rate (before they take effect in July), and for making the second-class postage rate, thereafter as heretofore, one and the same, level and uniform throughout the Union regardless of distance.

Cleanliness of the milker is essential to cleanliness of the milk ris essential to cleanliness of the milk, therefore he should wash and drawn his hands carefully before milking. The cows having been previously cleaned, the udder and flanks should be wiped with a waste cloth just before milking.

Milk is often contaminated, after it enters the house by being left uncovered. All milk containers should be rinsed out in cold water, the moment they are emptited of the milk, then washed in warm, soapy water: after this, rinse in boiling water and wipe with a fresh, perfectly clean towel. Milk should be kept in a very cool place. Cream is the fat of the milk which rises to the top, and is one of the most easily digested of fats. Sour cream should never be thrown away as it may be used to advantage in a variety of ways.

of fats. Sour creams should never be thrown away as it may be used to advantage in a variety of ways.

Cheese is made of curd and fat of milk. A skimmilk cheese contains less food value than one made from whole milk. Butter is made from the cream of the milk,—the United States Government insists the' butter supplied to her citizens shall contain no more than sixteen per cent water, and at least eighty-two and five tenths percent butter fat. There is very little poor butter from the point of view of nutrition sold today. The first and last word in butter making is cleanliness, clean stable, clean cans, clean milkers, clean utensils and a clean place to make it in. Today the large stores are showing many things which can be used to keep the milk so that it may be drawn off from the bottom, without disturbing the cream, strainers held in place by an iron standard, churns of all kinds, butter molds in all sizes and shapes, and many other things too numerous to mention.

Milk soups give an endless variety of nutritions dishes and when combined with vegetables they find especial favor with the farmers' wives, because they are easily procured.

CREAM CELERY SOUP.—Celery leaves and stalks, two and one half cups; water, two and one half cups; flour, one tablespoonful; milk, two and one half cups; pepper and salt, to taste.

Carefully wash the celery and place it in a kettle, covering it with water. Let it boil for one hour, then strain. When poured off have two and one half cups of water, put it in a double boiler and let it come to a boil,—then thicken with flour, add celery stock, also salt and pepper. Sometimes it is wise to add a little celery salt.

CREAM POTATO SOUP.—Take four large potatoes, peel and boil. Have a quart of milk belling in a double boiler. When the potatoes are hot, mash them thoroughly and add to the milk, also add two tablespoonfuls of melted butter, salt and pepper. If this is not as thick as heavy cream, add a little flour dissolved in cold milk. Onlon flavor can be used if desired.

Orange Custard.—Peel five or six oranges and cut in thin slices, sprinkling over them a cup of sugar. Boll one cup of milk in a double boiler and add the well-beaten yolks of three eggs, one tablespoonful of corn-starch, made smooth in cold milk. Stir constantly to prevent lumping. When thick enough pour over the fruit. Beat the whites of the eggs stiff and add two tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar. Spread over the custard and brown in the oven.

over the custard and brown in the oven.

PEACH COBBLER.—Make a paste of one pint of sour cream, two tablespoonfuls of lard, one teaspoonful of soda, a saltspoonful of salt and flour enough to make a dough. Mix as any puff paste, —roll thin and line a deep baking dish that has been well buttered. Fill the dish with slices of either fresh or canned peaches with plenty of sugar sprinkled over them. Cover the top with strips of pastry, about half an inch wide, making a lattice over the top. Pour in one and one half pints of water, if the peaches are fresh; if canned, use the juice and add two tablespoonfuls of melted butter.

ICE CREAM WITH ANY FLAVORING DESIRED.—Heat one quart of new milk, one pound of sugar, cool thoroughly and add one quart of heavy cream that has been whipped. Add any desired flavoring. Freeze.

CREAMED LOBSTER.—Stir into one pint of milk, one level teaspoonful of flour and one well-beaten egg. Cut the meat of one boiled lobster into pieces and add to the milk. Boil, and stir until the sauce thickens. When nearly done season with salt and pepper, butter and two tablespoonfuls of lemon juice. Serve on thin slices of buttered toast.

Dixie and Windy, Humphrey, Mo.—No girl of fifteen should go with a boy of twenty. What difference does it make about his size? You are far too young to have your head filled with such nonsense. (2) It is most decitedly wrong, unkind and uncivil to go to a show with one boy and then leave him and let another one take you home. (3) If your sister goes with a boy that people say is "half-silly" and she likes him and says that he "acts all right" when with her, perhaps that is because she is then just as silly as he is and cannot tell the difference.

ANXIOUS, Macon, Ga.—The things to order when at a restaurant with a young man are the things you like—and if he is the right sort he will see that you get them. But have some regard for his pocketbook, and try and like dishes that are not too expensive. (2) You should seat yourself at the table first, and make the first suggestion about leaving when the meal is over.

BROWN-EYED GIRL, Round Mt., Ala.—Here are three pages that we can hardly read, all about one boy that will not write or "rite" when he ought to, and another that Brown-Eyed Girl does not care for anyway. She has the blues, cannot eat, and wants to know what to do. And we say just as plainly and quickly as we can: Learn to read and write.

understand your meaning regarding Miss Prescott. How is she not one of 'your kind' nor 'mine?' Please describe her to me."
"Miss Prescott is very highly educated, very proud, very reserved, and—never did a wrong thing in her life," answered Miss Therwin, with a sneer.

a sneer.

"Then, according to that very trite axiom, 'only the good are happy,' this beautiful young lady must be in an exceedingly blissful statemost of the time. But notwithstanding that, according to your opinion, she is so diametrically opposed to me, your description of her character attracts rather than repels me. The positive and negative are always attracted by each other, you know, and I think I must know more of this young beauty."

him keenly.

"Thank you for the suggestion, Miss Therwin; and undoubtedly Miss Prescott would grace almost any coronet. Is young Prescott interested in her, and have you other views for him?"

She started as if something had stung her.

"You see, I have not forgotten, Miss Therwin, some of the campaigns in which you used to figure two years ago," the duke continued, quietly, as he noticed her emotion, and showing his teeth again.

as he noticed her emotion, and showing his teeth again.

But Miss Therwin recovered her composure immediately, and once more her clear, metallic laugh rang out.

"From this time I shall be a firm believer in that old saying that 'it takes a rogue to catch a rogue. My lord, I think you and I must have been born under the same planet, since we both display a natural ability for the accomplishment of certain purposes. Suppose we unite our forces henceforth, and work together. I know I can help you, and I think you can assist me."

"Miss Therwin, I acknowledge the wisdom of your remarks, and here is my hand to seal the compact. Now take my arm, and allow me to conduct you to some quiet place, where we can perfect our arrangements without the fear of being interrupted; for I have made up my mind to try my powers of fascination upon Miss Prescott."

graceful yet dignified reserve, she answered for herself:

"Excuse me, my lord, but I am engaged for the next half hour, after which we retire."

He could take no exception to her manner, for it was perfectly courteous, yet something told him that her pure soul shrank instinctively from him.

With another graceful bow, he turned away, with a smile on his hips, but a curse in his heart.

"Ada was right. "The dove will not mate with the hawk," he muttered, gnawing his mustache, then added, in concentrated tones, "My dark-eyed beauty, you and I will cross lances again, and you shall yield to me, willing or not."

ou us, you know."

"It will not avail; and, to return to axioms, of which you appear so fond, stars never move out of their orbit, you know."

"Are you daring me to do this thing, Miss Therwin? Are you goading me on for some purpose of your own?"

Ada's eyes snapped fire at his words.

"You do not appear to be one of Miss Presective admirers," he added, noticing it; "and I know you of old."

"On the contrary, I am quite an intimate friend of the young lady."

"Then deliver me from intimate friends A And how happy Miss Prescott must be to possess such a friend!" the duke remarked, exposing his white teeth again in his very peculiar smile.

"You appear to be strangely interested in her; what should cause it, my lord?" demanded Miss Therwin, suspiciously.

The thought came to her that perhaps he might know something relating to her secret.

"I confess that I am interested in her; her face, her manner, her voice, all have a strange attraction for me," he answered, seriously, and Ada Therwin regarded him in astonishment.

"If you are in earnest, I wish you might succeed in your designs above all things!" she cried. With excited earnestness.

"How so?" he demanded, in turn surprised.

"It would be a very fine thing for Sthyl to become the Duchess d'Aubigne," she said, eying him keenly.

"Thank you for the suggestion, Miss Therwin; and undoubtedly Miss Prescott would grace."

"In and undoubtedly Miss Prescott would grace."

Premium No. 7763

THERE has been no Premium offer in years that has been so pleasing to our friends as this new Comb and Brush Set. The great beauty of this latest style dark green or Maiachie finish on the back of brush with the Silvering shield for engraving initial or monogram has made this set one of the best as a present for birthday, wedding or any special occasion. The brush is nime inches long over 21-2 inches wide with splendid firm white bristles well fastened and should leat for years. The Comb is black, seven inches long and one done half inches wide with coarse and fine teeth.

The next was a waitz, and Raymond felt the thrill of disgust which ran over Sibyl's frame at this request.

He was about to reply for her, when, with 7763.

If You Are A Woman Who Loves Crochet And Tatting Here Is A Set Of Books You Will Be Delighted To Own!

Of Books You Will Be Delighted To Own!

Ary one of these books alone is a veritable treasure house of the newest, most beautiful designs. The seven books combined form a complete library in which you will find any pattern in crocheting and tatting you could possibly ask for. You will fairly revel in the many handsome designs shown. There are edgings, beadings, insertions and laces for every conceivable use. The fillustrations are actual photographs of the finished work and show every thread so plainly that they are almost as good to work from as the directions themselves. The directions are adapted for either beginner or expert. They tell stitch by stitch how each pattern is worked, also the quantity and size of material required and the correct sizes of hooks to be used. Following is a description of each book. They are 8 by 10 1-2 inches in size with the exception of Volume I which is 9 1-4 by 12 inches. Please order by numbers.

Volume 1 Crocheted yokes for combinations, envelopes, nightgowns, corset covers; etc.—fifteen all different, exquisite designs.

Volume 2 Handsome crocheted edgings and insertions suitable for handker-chiefs, underwear, dresses and a multitude of other uses, thirty-three different designs.

Volume 3 Eighteen lovely designs in Cluny pieces, library scarfs, bouldoir caps, corset coveryokes, piano scarfs, curtains, chemises, envelopes or combination suits.

Volume 4 Twenty-five handsome designs in caps, candle shades, baby bonnets, bedspreads, doilies, library scarfs, pillows, centerpieces, portiere, medalions, curtains, etc., etc.

Volume 5 Twenty-five designs in novelty and clover leaf crochete, including mile-a-minute and clover leaf crocheted yokes, primrose and sunflower yokes; doilies, centerpieces, boudoir caps unique edges and insertions for serving trays; novelty aprons and collars

Volume 6 Thirty-two designs in tatting, and beautiful assortment of tatted handkerchief edges, edgings and insertions, tatted yokes, boudoir caps, towel edges, medallions; yokes, breakfast caps, centerpieces, edgings and lace in Maltese crochet and yokes in Irish crochet.

Volume 7 Thirty handsome novelty crocheted designs including rose, sunflower periwinkle, and Venetian yokes; boudoir caps, monkey face library, scarf, and lace pillow; large and small baskets, hat pin holder, jewel box, vanity tray coin purse, utility bag, starfish doily, pineapple centerpiece; edgings and insertions in pillow lace; daisy edging; spider, bell, rick-rack, novelty and coronation braid laces.

WE advise you to order all seven of these splendid books before the assortment is broken. If however, you do not care for the whole library at this time we have arranged the following special offers which give you the opportunity to secure any two or any four or the entire seven books. When ordering please be very careful to state the number of each book desired.

In writing this department always sign your true name and give your address; if not, your let-ter will receive no attention. Name will not be published.

HILDREN, your letters this month move me alternately from smiles to tears, much like the proverbial weather. But as space is limited, I will cut short my greeting and get down to work.

The first letter is from Ruth of Ash, Oregon, who is only thirteen years old, and already the men, both married and single, fall in love with her, and she wants to know how to prevent being so attractive. Well, Miss Helen-Cleopatra, you might have your beautiful hair clipped off (for, of course, it is beautiful), your pearly teeth extracted and your face tattooed in fantastic designs. That ought to destroy your fatal beauty to such an extent that you could have a 'few minutes' peace.'' Don't be so silly, and let me tell you something—it is my candid opinion they are laughing at you because you are such a silly child. TESSIE, Ash, Oregon.—Don't give up hope so easily.

TESSIE, Ash, Oregon.—Don't give up hope so easily. We hope the war will soon be over and that there will be enough young men left to go around and a few to spare, and with your accomplishments you should have no difficulty in getting a husband. I really mean that, for not every girl of seventeen years is a good cook and housekeeper. Walt a few years before you get married.

TROUBLED GIRL, Vida, Ala.—If you love him and he loves you, and he can give you a good home, why don't you marry him, if you want to, instead of asking me about it. Don't, though, unless you can love his little girl and be a true mother to her.

Heart of Hearts, Holdrege, Neb.—I can't tell you exactly what love is, but you will know when you meet the right man, and don't you think, my dear, you had better wait for him? Really, I don't think you love this man well enough to marry him, but perhaps you will later. Won't he wait a year or two until you are sure, when you convince him that it means his happiness as well?

means his happiness as well?

BETTY JANE, Lafayette, Ohio.—Since your home life is so very unhappy, you would be justified in seeking work elsewhere that would give you more time and energy for evening study, but you-must decide that for yourself. Don't blame your mother too much if she is querulous and apparently unsympathetic, for, after all, her life hasn't been happy, has it? Show her that you love her and that she means more to you than anything else, and help her all you can, but you are the one to decide how you can best do that.

are the one to decide how you can best do that.

Heartbroken, Washington.—Here's another girl, only twelve years old, whose home life is unhappy. All the advice I can give you is "grin and bear it" until you are capable of taking care of yourself, for you are too young to leave home unless you can find a home with good people who will give you an education. Don't let anything take you away from school. Do your share toward keeping the house clean and neat and perhaps your stepmother will do hers.

BLEEDING HEART, Coushatta, La.—And to think that I wasted a lot of perfectly good sympathy on you while I was reading the first part of your sad letter—how the aristocratic and wealthy parents threaten to disinherit their son if he marries you, and you love him and don't want to give him up, and he loves you and then in the same breath, almost, you ask me, how to attract the attention of other young men if you part from him. Same way you always have.

BROWN EYES, Watkins, Ore.—I don't think it would be so very wrong for the hired man to come into the kitchen-hin the evening and talk to the hired girl while she is dong the work, provided it is agreeable to both of them and the mistress of the house doesn't object.

DIAMOND TOES, Custer City, Okla.—No one can call

DIAMOND TOES, Custer City, Okla.—No one can call you a piker when it comes to a nom de plume, can they, Diamond Toes? That's about the best one yet. If you had sense enough to quit a man because he drank, why don't you stay quit and not say you "can't get him off, your mind." Marry him and you won't be able to either, only it will be much worse then.

be able to either, only it will be much worse then.

JOLLY JINGLES, Hull, Iowa.—It isn't wrong for you to let a fellow wear your ring to "keep him from going with other girls," but it is decidedly foolish.

A ball and chain would be more secure, or, better still, you might tether him in your front yard where you could watch him all the time. If he isn't true to you because he wants to be, don't fool yourself into thinking that wearing your ring will make any difference.

man, whom you don't care for, just to make him happy. It is the surest way to make you both unhappy.

Frances and Evelyn, Moro, Texas.—War is all that Sherman said it was, isn't it, Frances, for it is the cause of a "wealthy French girl" stealing your sweetheart, and you think your heart is broken and want to know how to win him back. Silly, you don't want to know how to win him back. Silly, you don't want him if he is that sort; but you might write and tell him how glad you were to hear that, for it leaves you free to return the love of a good man who wants to marry you. It was all right, Eveline, to kips your sweetheart good by when he went away, but why did you enter into it in such a wholesale manner and kips all the boys who went with him. I don't blame him for being cross. I'm glad I wasn't the last one to be kipsed, for just think of all the different germs you must have collected en route.

Broken Hearten, Eureka, Kans.—Why didn't you offer him regular jitney rates when he demanded payment for the automobile rides he had given you. That would have shamed him. You've heard the song, "Keep Away From the Fellow Who Owns An Automobile," and that's my advice to you in this particular case until he humbly apologizes and promises to behave himself in the future.

Blue-Eyed B., Troy, N. Y.—Even if willing to endersteen even the stage of the stage o

BLUE-EYED B., Troy, N. Y.—Even if willing to endanger your own life by marrying a consumptive man, you have no right to bring innocent little children into the world with such a dread taint in their blood, and if you have a real mother heart you won't do it. Why doesn't he try a different climate and perhaps he can be cured if the disease isn't too far advanced. (2) If it isn't too late, the young man might properly take you for a short ride before taking you home from an evening entertainment, but don't go if it is late.

Everybody happy now? Yes! That's good, and I've tried not to scold, even at the foolish letters, because it is April first and you know what that means.

My best to you,

COUSIN MARION.

broke. Their little world went wild with electricity and wind and hail. Terrified, and craving the touch of human hands, Cecily crept close to her husband, and he, unrepulsed, took her into his arms. They stood so, speechless, his cheek against her hair, till the storm passed. Then he went out to join his men.

In a few moments he was back. "It's all gone, Mignonette—wheat, corn, oats. What isn't cut by hail is laid flat by the wind. But there isn't much room in my heart for regret so long as I've got you, sweet." His eyes devoured her face hungrily as she lifted her lips for his first kiss. Early the next morning a limousine crept up the washed-out roads to The Elms and an erect old man emerged. Noble, coming from the stable, tanned, broad of shoulder, steady of eye, met him at the gate.

"You've staged your entrance perfectly, sir," he said. "Everything is ruined." "Are you God

BUILT LIKE THE BIG RACERS

This fine little automobile is built especially for boys and girls. You can learn to run it in an hour's time. No complicated parts to get out of order and is perfectly safe for a child of 8 years. This little Culver Racer will do anything a full-sized car will do because it is built in proportion to a big car. Have been giving these little automobiles away for several years, and they are giving the very best of satisfaction. The Culver Racer not only affords a world of pleasure for boys and girls but is also a real necessity. You can run errands, take things to market, go after the mail and just do anything with a Culver Racer—all you have to do is to crank it, jump in and go—further information and complete specifications will be sent you. Some girl or boy is going to be the proud owner of this fine Culver Racer at the close of this club—why not YOU—solve the puzzle below and get in on the ground floor.

Second Grand Prize Value $100.00

Here I am—I am wondering what nice little boy or girl will be my master at the close of this club. My name is "Don"; I am 4-years old and about 40 inches high; I am real black with four white feet and some white in my mane and tail. We do not show a very good picture of "Don" but he is a mighty pretty little pony and loves nice Boys and Girls and wants a good home. We gave "Don's" little brother away last month to a nice little girl just 8 years old, and I just wish you could know how easily she won him. Don't fail to join my club—solve the puzzle below and write TODAY.

How Many Words Can You Make?

This puzzle is a sure prize winner—absolutely everyone in this club wins. It is not hard either—just a little ingenuity and skill. The puzzle is to get as many words as possible out of the letters herewith given. Use only the list given, and only as many times as they appear in this ad. For instance, the letter Y appears three times, so in all your words you must not use Y more than three times. If you use Y twice in one word, and once in another, you cannot use Y in any other word as you have already used it as many times as it appears in this advertisement. It is not necessary that you use all the letters. The puzzle looks easy and simple, but if you can make as many as 12 or 15 words, send in your list at once, as the person winning first prize may not have more than that many.

Senator Mason Now Says

Nuxated Iron Should Be Made Known to Every Nervous, Run-down, Anaemic Man, Woman and Child

Opinions of Dr. Ferdinand King, New York Physician and Medical Author; Dr. James Francis Sullivan, Formerly Physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.) New York and the Westchester County Hospital; Former Health Commissioner Wm. R. Kerr of the City of Chicago and others.

WHAT SENATOR MASON SAYS:

"I have often said I would never recommend medicine of any kind, I believe that the doctor's place. However, after the hardest political campaign of my life, without a chance for a vacation, I had been starting to court every morning with that horrible tired feeling which cannot be described. I was advised to try Nuxated Iron. As a pioneer in the pure feod and drug legislation, I was-at first loath to try an advertised remedy, but after advising with one of my medical friends I gave it a test. The results have been so beneficial in my own case I made up my mind to let my friends know about it, and you are at liberty to publish this statement if you so desire. I am now sixty-five years of age, and I feel that a remedy which will build up the strength and increase the power and endurance of one of my age should be known to every nervous, run-down amomic man, woman and child."

known to every nervous, run-doicn anemic man, woman and child."

Senator Mason's statement in regard to Nuxated Iron was shown to several physicians who were requested to give their opinions thereon.

Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly Physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.) New York, and the Westchester County Hospital, said: "Senator Mason is to be commended on handing out this statement on Nuxated Iron for public print. There are thousands of men and women who need a strength and blood builder but do not know what to take. In my own opinion there is nothing better than organic iron—Nuxated Ironfor enriching the blood and helping to increase the strength and endurance of men and women who burn up too rapidly their nervous energy in the strenuous strain of the great business competition of the day."

Dr. Ferdinand King, a New York Physician and Medical Author, said: "I heartily endorse Senator Mason's statement in regard to Nuxated Iron. There ment in regard to Nuxated Iron, There ment in regard to Nuxated Iron. There can be no vigorous iron men without iron. Pallor means anemia. Anemia means iron deficiency. The skin of anemic men and women is pale; the flesh flabby; the muscles lack tone; the brain fags, and the memory fails, and often they become weak, nervous, irritable, despondent and melancholy.

"In the most common foods of America, the starches, sugars, table syrups, candies, pelished rice; white bread, soda erackers, biscuits, macaroni, spaghetti, tapioca, sago, farina, degerminated cornmeal, no longer is iron to be found. Remeal, no longer is iron to be found.

tapioca, sago, farina, degerminated corn-meal, no longer is iron to be found. Re-fining processes have removed the iron of Mother Earth from these impoverished foods, and silly methods of home cookery, by throwing down the waste pipe the water in which our vegetables are cooked, are responsible for another grave iron loss.

loss. "Therefore, you should supply the iron deficiency in your food by using some form of organic iron—Nuxated Iron—just as you would use saft when your loss not enough salt."

food has not enough salt."
Dr. E. Sauer, a Bostom physician who has studied abroad im great European medical institutions, said: "Senator Mason is right. As I have said a hundred times over, organic iron is one of the greatest of all strength builders. If people would only take Nuxated Iron when they feel weak or run-down, instead of dosing themselves with habit-forming drugs, stimulants and alcoholic beverages I am convinced that there are thousands who might readily build up their red blood corpuscles, increase their physical energy and get themselves into a condition to ward off the millions of disease germs that are almost continually around us. "It is surprising how many people sufter from iron deficiency and do not know it. Iron is absplutely necessary to enable your blood to change food into living tissue. Without it, no matter how much or what you eat your food merely passes through you without doing you good. You don't get the strength out of it, and as a consequence you become weak, pale and sickly looking, just like a plant trying to grow in a soil deficient in iron. If you are not strong or well you owe it to yourself to make the following test: See how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. Next, take two five-grain tablets of ordinary nuxated iron three times per day after meals for two weeks. Then test your strength again, and see how much you have gained. I have seen dozens of nervous, run-down people who were alling all the while increase their strength and endurance in two weeks 'time while taking iron in the proper form. And this, after they had in some cases been doctoring for months without getting benefit from anything. Many an athlete and prize-fighter has won the day simply because he knew the secret of great strength and endurance which comes from having plenty of iron in the blood, while many another has gone down in inglorious defeat simply for the lack of iron."

Former Health Commissioner Wm. R. Kerr, of Chicago, says it ought to be used in every hospital and prescribed by every physician. Unlie former Health Commissioner Kerr is not himself a physician, still his experience in handling public it a most remark effective remedy."

NOTE—Nuxated Iron, which is prescribed and recommended above by physicians is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is asily assimilated does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed in this city by all good druggists.—Advertisement.

Directory, published by the "William E. Mason, Senator for Congress in 1887, to the 51st Congress, 1892—elected Senator to the 55th Congress, 1897 to 1903." Senator Mason is now Congressman from the State of Illinois.

Senator Mason's championship of Pure Food and Drugs legislation, his fight for the rural free delivery system, and his strong advocacy of all bills favoring labor and the rights of the masses as against trusts and combines, made him a flational figure at Washington and endeared him to the hearts of the working man and the great masses of people throughout the United States. Senator Mason has the distinction of being one of the really big men of the nation. His strong endorsement of Nuxated Iron must convince any intelligent thinking reader that it must be a preparation of great merit and one which the Senator feels is bound to be of great value to the masses of people everywhere, otherwise he could not afford to lend his name to it, especially after his strong advocacy of pure food and drugs legislation.

Since Nuxated Iron has attained such an enormous sale-over three million people using it annually—other iron preparations are often recommended as a substitute for it. The reader should remember that there is a vast difference between ordinary metallic iron and the organic iron contained in Nuxated Iron, therefore, always insist on having Nuxated Iron as recommended by Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), and the Westchester County Hospital; Dr Schuyler C. Jacques, Visiting Surgeon of St. Elizabeth's Hospital, New York; and other physicians. In this connection Dr. James Francis Sullivan says: "Thousands of persons go on suffering year after year, doctoring themselves for all kinds of ills, when the real and true cause underlying their condition is simply a lack of sufficient iron in the red blood corrupts to early levels of surgicions. dition is simply a lack of sufficient iron in the red blood corpuscles to enable Nature to transform the food they eat into brawn, muscle, tissue and brain. But the old forms of metallic iron which frequently do more harm than good.

"Notwithstanding all that has been said and written on this subject by well-known physicians, thousands of people still insist in dosing themselves with metallic iron simply, I suppose, because it costs a few cents less. I strongly advise readers in all cases to get a physician's prescription for organic iron—Nuxated Iron—or if you don't want to go to this trouble then purchase only Nuxated Iron in its original packages and see that this particular name (Nuxated Iron) appears on the package. If you have taken preparations such as Nux and Iron and other similar iron products and failed to get results, remember that such products are anentirely different thing from Nuxated Iron.

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find dressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

Anxious Enquirer, Union Chapel, Ind.—It would be impossible for us to tell you what wages a woman could earn working in a munition plant. It would depend entirely upon what sort of labor she performed, and how many hours per day she worked. We believe that a great many of the reports regarding the extravagant salaries paid in munition factories are exaggerated and untrue. Write to the Employment Secretary of the Y. W. C. "What does this thing mean?" he asked, with a look at one of the letters. "She says she isn't dying, but that she thought to say so might hurry you. What is it that you must know tonight, or it will be too late?"

"It can't be anything! All she can tell me is dead and gone." said Ravenel, with shame. "Oh, Levallion! I hate your knowing how wicked I was, to worry you—and all that."

"Hush, hush!" almost roughly. "Don't talk like that. Look here, I'll tell you what we'll do! We'll go over to the farm when the others have gone to bed. The hour won't matter if they're sitting up with her. I'll tell the boy, go, go now."

There was a kind of awkward hush when Lord and Lady Levallion entered the drawing-room. The duchess had gone away that day, and her absence had loosened Lady Gwendolen's tongue. Lord Chayter rushed into the breach.

"Where's that stuff you were talking of the other day?" he asked Levallion. "You said it cured headaches, and I've a most infernal one."

"I said it enlivened the soul, if you had one," dryly. "It isn't a medicine. It's as liqueur, Eau de Vie Magique. But I think I drank it all. I don't know where it is."

"In your dressing-room," said Ravenel promptly. "I'll get it." There was something in the don't know where it is."

"In your dressing-room," said Ravenel promptly. "I'll get it." There was something in the women's faces that troubled her, something covert in their eyes that she was glad to escape from.

Mr. Jacobs arose hastily from a secluded corner and followed her out; and as he lumbered affably beside her she never dreamed that her life hung on whether he came with her or not.

Five minutes later she was back; panting, white, with startled eyes, a squat bottle in her hand.

white, with startled eyes, a squat bottle in her hand.

"Have you seen a ghost?" said Levallion, from where he stood by the liqueur-stand.

"No!" she gasped—and she looked as if she had seen murder!

"Jacobs frightened me—dreadfully! He—It think there must have been a cat." As she held the bottle out to him it shook in her hand.

"It's a dead cat, then," said Tommy. He rose and went to see where Jacobs had gone to, but no one took any notice of his movements.

"I shall have to dose you!" said Levallion, lightly. "Your nerves are all off. There's very little here, Chayter, I'd thought there was more. And it looks muddy!" He poured it out and glanced at it. Instead of being clearly green, it was a little clouded.

"Seems so, somehow!" Levallion sniffed it suspiciously.

"Smells of almonds." He raised the glass so his lips and tasted it, giving the bottle to Ravenel.

"Levallion!" Her shriek terrified them, born of unreasoning terror as it was. "Put it down, don't touch it!" Wildly, frantically, she tried to snatch the glass, but she was too late.

Levallion had mechanically swallowed the strangely flavored mouthful. He turned to her, smiling. "It's quite spoiled. You've—."

The empty bottle fell from her hand, crashed to atoms on the floor.

"Levallion!" she screamed, "speak to me!"

He swayed toward her, his handsome face convulsed; crashed, like a log, to the floor. As she sprang to him he struggled, his teeth clenched.

"We ought to have gone!" he gasped. "Ravenel—she's been too much for me!"

But when she would have lifted his head it dropped lifeless on her breast.

Mrs. L. B., North Carolina.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow, but no children or descendants, his personal estate, after payment of debts and expenses, would go one half to the surviving widow and the residue in equal shares to his next of kin who are in equal degree of relationship to the decedent, and to those who represent the ones who are dead, but that in case there are no next of kin, we think the widow would receive all the personal estate absolutely; money in bank would be personal property, and would be included in the personal estate.

Mrs. M. what your rights may be.

Worried Wife, Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that actions based upon an implied promise for the payment of money are barred by the statute of limitations after five years and that actions upon open accounts are barred within five years from the time of the last item of debit or credit. We think that in your state, children may be legally disinherited by will or that one child may receive a larger share than another. FEEDING a BROOD SOW.—I would like to know a good ration for a brood sow, before and after farrowing time, when milk cannot be had.

A.—During pregnancy, make the sow take exercise every day and feed her alfalfa hay, a little corn silage or roots and a light slop of wheat middlings, ground barley or rye and a little oil meal. To enforce exercise and keep the bowels active is imperative. For 24 hours after farrowing allow tepid water only, then a sloppy mash of same feeds as those given before farrowing, but very little of it for a week. If possible, make the slop of milk and provide green feed on pasture, such as alfalfa, clover, rape or rye, etc. Avoid stuffing on corn. If you wish to add a little tankage, which is excellent, give it from a self-feeder.

Theretiess Cow.—I have a cow four years old that laps water like a dog. She eats anything given her, but is thin in flesh. I have seen her stand at the pond and lap for an hour. What is the trouble and is there a cury?

A.—An examination would be necessary in this case to determine why the cow cannot detrain and and is the cause, but we cannot determine that, and so you should have an examination made by a local veterinarian. Tuberculosis or actinomycosis of the glands of the throat is a possibility.

WARBLES.—I have a cow and she has what some call wolves in her back. Will you tell me how to get throat is a possibility.

WARBLES.—I have a cow and she has what some call wolves in her back. Will you tell me how to get rid of them?

A.—The "wolves" are "warbles"—larve or grubs—of the ox warble fly and cause misery, as well as greatly damaging the hide for leather. Squeeze out each mature grub by pressing down upon it with the open mouth of a large bottle, then destroy the grub. Wash the back with a two per cent. solution of coal tar dip, or carbolic acid.

Wash the back with a two per cent. solution of coal tar dip, or carbolic acid.

Cerebro Spinal-Meningitis.—Please tell me what was the matter, and cause of death, with my horse I have lost. He was about thirteen years old, in good working order. He seemed to be very chilly during cold days. I found him down one morning in stall. Got him up and he ate about half his feed by bracing himself against the wall. Then he began throwing himself against the wall. Then he began throwing his head first at one side, then the other, striking the wall or anything that might be in his way. Then fell to the ground and was quiet for an hour, then began to jerk and shiver, having a hard chill till he died. He appeared as though he had blind staggers. I fed corn, corn tops and fodder and some pea vine hay.

A.—The disease mentioned in title of this answer is caused by micro-organisms in feed and perhaps most commonly in damaged corn or corn fodder. There is no specific remedy. Taken in time, a physic, followed by sedatives, may help, the horse to be supported in slings, but a qualified veterinarian is needed to give intelligent treatment. Prevention is all-mportant. No damaged feed ever should be fed to a horse, but cattle and hogs often take the feed that would kill a horse.

Forging.—I have a four-year-old colt and every time new shoes are put on he hits his front shoes. (2) I have a horse and when he stands in the stable a few days his hind legs swell. I would like to know what to do.

A. F. Z.

A.—Set the hind shoes back an inch or so and then rasp off the toe. Bevel the toes of the fore shoes to cause quick rolling motion. Keep the horse "up on the bit" when driving and don't drive him until he is leg weary. (2) Never let any horse stand for a single day without work or exercise. Allow the horse a box-stall when in the stable and each time he comes in rub the leg dry and bandage with flannel from feet to hock joints.

hair on its legs below the knees, nor on its nose.

A.—As lameness is present, you should, if possible, have the hock joint line-fired and blistered by a qualified veterinarian and then tie the mare up short in a narrow stall for six weeks. If you cannot have that done, clip off the hair and blister the hock two or three times at intervals of three weeks while the mare is kept tied up. (2) The cow is diseased, probably, with tuberculosis, and so is dangrous. As she is unprofitable, and treatment would not be likely to pay, we should advise her destruction. It would, of course, be better to have a local graduate veterinarian make an examination and advise what should be done.

Four Wheel Chairs in March 455 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

I am pleased to note the increase in wheel-chair subscriptions the past month which enables me to award four wheel chairs for March.

The four March wheel chairs go to the following shut-ins, and the figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

Lyle Bradley Gibson, West Lyon St., Mt. Pleasant, Mich., 200; Mrs. Caroline Naomi Alford, Waelder, Texas, 132; Mrs. Nathe Johnes, Blue Springs, Miss.,

124; Oscar Eneas Lee, Sparta, Mo., 116. Lyle Gibson, nine years old next May, is almost entirely helpless, caused by infantile paralysis which attacked him when a six months old babe. When moved he has to be carried. He is bright mentally, and the wheel chair will be a source of pleasure to him and a help to his mother in caring for him,

HOWARD CANNOY ENJOYING HIS COMFORT WHEEL

Mrs. Alford, age 32, has been an invalid for three years and is helpless from her hips down, She is the mother of five children. As she can use her arms she expects her wheel chair to be a great help and bene-

Mrs. Johnes, age 56, is so crippled by rheumatism in her feet and legs that she is unable to stand. Her husband is sick and can not work, so they are de-pendent on their four sons, three of whom are going to war, as her friend Mrs. Price writes, leaving only the youngest, aged 18, at home.

Oscar Lee, age 9 years, has been a cripple from birth and his legs have never developed. He is a bright little fellow and will greatly enjoy his wheel

I hope that in the next few months we shall be able to make up for the set-back which the severe winter has given our wheel-chair activities.

Is it not a real joy to feel that you have helped to bring happiness and cheer into the lives of such patient little sufferers as Howard Cannoy whose picture is reproduced above?

The letter of thanks from his mother is printed below, also our Roll of Honor for the month.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 25 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad-te do my part a little faster each mouth than you do yours. Any shut-le who has friends to help him get subscriptions can obtain a wheel chair free. Write me for information.

Very Much Pleased with His Wheel Chair

KINGSPORT, TENN.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

Howard received his chair in good condition, and is yery much pleased with it. It will be a great help to me in taking care of him. I enclose a picture of him enjoying his wheel chair. I want to thank you and all those who helped me get it.

Truly yours,

MRS. R. A. CANNOY.

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.
Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

M. E. D., Eagle, Colo.—A pastry-free diet, drinking freely of good water, and an occasional compound cathartic pill, should help you. If the aural vertigo continues, you should consult an ear specialist at once. Never put anything in the external ear smaller than the elbow, and never snuff anything up the nose for eatarrh. Permanent injury can be done by either the use of hairpins in the external ear canal, or the snuffing up of borax in solution or any other remedy. Use only a good spray apparatus for administering remedies to the throat or nose, especially the latter.

W. J. C., Omaha, Nebr.—Lassar's Paste can be obtained at any druggist's. It should not be used in full strength, but diluted with vaseline at least one to four parts or more.

G. M. P., Rocklake, N. Dak.—The best remedy for

G. M. P., Rocklake, N. Dak.—The best remedy for smallpox is the use of a good vaccine, now obtainable by the local physician. We do not recall the remedy referred to in COMFORT.

W. F. L., Romance, W. Va.—The eruption referred to may be a mild form of psoriasis, so-called. The Lassar's Paste, referred to many times in COMFORT, might be tried.

'WORRED.''—The pains in shoulder blade and breasts no doubt due in a measure to your age. If they not too severe, wait a while and they will improve you develop.

MISS E. G., Piedmont, Kans.—If you mean by paralysis, facial paralysis or Bell's palsy, of rheumatic origin, electricity and diet will cure it. Use the galvanic current only. Granulated lids may be due to the need of eye glasses. A weak ointment of yellow oxide of mercury applied at night will help the condition. Use only a one per cent. ointment, and apply only once a day.

Mrs. M. G., Buchanan, Va.—A very good remedy for ringwerm of the face or arms is the so-called Coster's paste. Iodine 120 grains and oil of tar one ounce. This is applied once a week only. (2) Whooping cough is a self-limited disease; there is no specific remedy for it. Complications only are to be considered and watched. Inhalations of creosote or eucalyptol are useful, a few drops of either being inhaled from boiled water. Where the paroxysms are severe, small doses of bromide of soda may be given—one grain to a dose,—dissolved in warm water. A well-ventilated room, plenty of sunlight and good hygienic surroundings generally are good treatment.

Mrs. S. J. B., Salt Lake, Utah.—Your teeth should be attended to at once, as no doubt much of your intestinal trouble is caused by improper mastication of your food. You must also see that your bowels are regulated. The intestinal gas can be controlled by taking American Oil—a half-tablespoonful with your meals.

ing American Oil—a half-tablespoonful with your meals.

L. M. C., Parrottsville, Tenn.—Nervousness is only a symptom of deeper trouble. You should try some good out-of-door work or exercise. Possibly a change of climate and association would be of benefit. If you have eye strain, have this remedied by some competent oculist. If possible, try to forget or overcome the cause of your trouble.

MRs. A. H., Schoolfield, Va.—Your trouble is an enlarged lymphatic gland. The application of tincture of iodine two or three times a week might help-you.
If local remedies do no good, have it removed by an operation.

MRs. J. B. Sugar Run, Pa.—A powder composed

operation.

Mrs. J. B. Sugar Run, Pa.—A powder composed of lycopodiom, an ounce, and salicylic acid, four grains, might help you. Dust the powder in your stockings once a day. The pain in your shoulder blade does not indicate kidney trouble, but may suggest liver trouble. Maybe you eat too much pastry and do not drink enough water.

Mrs. O. S., Carthage, Miss.—You can get cubeb berries at any drug store. If you have catarrh of the nose, Bobell's solution sprayed in the nostrils daily will help you and do much more good than the cubeb berries referred to.

Mrs. G. H. Minnesots Lake, Minn.—Acne, respects berries referred to.

Miss G. H., Minnesota Lake, Minn.—Acne rosacea as to cause is obscure, but in general it is due to gastro-intestinal disorder, uterine disease, use of too much tea and coffee or alcohol. Extract of the thyroid gland in grain doses is sometimes beneficial. The local application of the so-called compound lotio alba is also indicated. This lotion can be obtained at the local druggist's. This disease is no impediment to marriage, in fact marriage might be beneficial.

Mrs. W. S. M., Midland, Pa.—Wash the scalp with some good tar soap after having applied some raw linseed oil to the scalp for twenty-four hours. After drying the hair, use a lotion composed of grain alcohol, one ounce, rose water, one ounce, and five grains of resoren. Apply this lotion sparingly twice a week

MRS. J. S., Fremont, Ohio.—There is only one way to get rid of superfluous hair, and that is by the employment of the electric needle, each hair being treated separately. This must be done only by a competent specialist.

E. F. M., Johnstown, Pa.—You can only reduce your weight by dieting, exercise in the open and salt water bathing. Every other day eat only a limited amount of food, and two or three times a week live only on skimmed milk, using only one quart per day in divided quantities—say one tumblerful four times a day. One pound of Rochelle salts in your bath will also help. Use a prolonged hot bath with the addition of the salts.

MRS. J. W., St. Paul, Minn.—The faucets may be connected with some electric current in the house, and you get a slight discharge from the faucet in this way. The tickling of the thigh may be simply a hyperesthesia of the region.

Best wishes to all the sisters,
Mes. M. F. Painter.

Mrs. Painter.-When that irresponsible husband of yours grows up perhaps he will know better than to annoy that poor, little helpless baby— provided it lives until that time and escapes being a nervous wreck. Some time when he is tired and sleepy, try pinching his cheeks and pulling his nose and see how he likes it.—Ed.

N. Dak., for Mrs. H. B. Newell, 9; Thomas Jefferson Mathis, La., for Mrs. S. E. Whittington, 9; Sergeant George Brown, Kans., for General, 8; Irene Hicks, Ark., for Elma Williams, 6; Mrs. M. Humes, Kans., for Feme Hicks, Ark., for Elma Williams, 6; Mrs. M. Humes, Kans., for Feme Parker, 5; Anna Gunther, Okla., for Lyle Gibson, 5; Mrs. Mary Cline, Texas, for Harlon Lane, 5.

BETTING ON A SURE THING.—The town boaster had just finished telling how good a shot he was with a rifle. The Oldest Citizen declared that he would bet a ten-spot that he couldn't hit a barn door at one hundred yards. Soon afterward the boastful young man returned from the vicinity of the barnyard with a disgrunted look.

"What's the matter, Tom?" asked a friend. "Didn't you hit it?"

"Naw!" exclaimed the shooter. "He turned the door edgewise."—Boston Post. -

Best Ways of Doing Things Around The Home

To take the shine from black garments, try rubbing the spots with a piece of raw Irish potato.

To prevent starch from sticking, add a little coal oil. Mrs. C. C. Smith, Guntersville, Ala. Wax for sealing bottles and jars may be made at home by melting together equal parts of resin and beef suct or tallow.

TO SOUR MILK QUICKLY.—Add a teaspoonful of vine gar to a quart of milk and it will sour in half th time it usually takes. Mrs. F. W. MERRITT.

Remedies

A little sugar moistened with vinegar and placed in the mouth will stop hiccoughs.

For soft corns, bind on a piece of light bread, soaked vinegar.

These Roses Will Bloom And Bloom All Summer!

Mrs. Folly Hobbs

A DELICATE ivory white rose—one of the most delightful and showlest of recent years and absolutely distinct—there is no other white rose quite like it. Its rich green foliage is unusually thick and close set, forming a plant of rare beauty. Its fragrance is superb and it produced on long stems freely and continuously, the beautiful dark green foliage and profuse blooming qualities combined with absolute hardiness make this one of the finest roses for masswith thick shell-shaped petals on long stiff stems.

Soundly Cured At the Age of 81

Mr. C. E. Brooks, Marshall, Mich. Dear Sir:-

Less than a year ago Less than a year ago I sent to you for an appliance which came promptly. I at once put it on and it fitted perfectly. I have worn the appliance not quite 10½ months.

It has cured my rupture.
I tried the other day while the appliance was off, to see if I could force affything out of the opening to make a break there but I could not though I tried hard.

there but I could not though I tried hard.
Now I think this quite remarkable as I am in my eighty-first year. I am an old veteran of the Civil War, born and raised in the town of New Boston, State of New Hampshire, from which place I enlisted in the 10th N. H. Vol. Inft. in Co. C, commanded by Col. M. T. Donahue.
I cannot feel but that I owe you this testimony for I had never expected to be cured. However.

Cured Without Operation

"Was Sure He Would Be a Cripple"

Mr. C. E. Brooks, Marshall, Mich.

Dear Sir :-

Dear Sir:—
Enclosed is a picture of my children, and the little man you see seated on the chair is the one who was cured by your Appliance.
He had been ruptured quite a while before we wrote you, and I was sure that he would be a cripple the rest of his life. However, some helping hand showed me an adin a newspaper, with the result that he was in perfect health through the seatern of the seate

The dector advised an operation, which I would not consent to. Your advice was to put an Air Cushion Appliance on him, and I must say that it is worth ten times what it cost.

I wish you could have seen him before we used the Appliance and now, when he is fully as sound as anyone could be.

I cannot thank you too much for what you have done for my boy.

Yours respectfully,

OLIVER HANSON.

The above is C. E. Brooks, inventor of the Appliance, who cured himself and who is now giving others the benefit of his experience. If ruptured, write him today, at Marshall, Mich.

Marshall, Mich. Dear Mr. Brooks:

Answering your letter, will say we need no more Appliances, as our son has been completely cured by wearing your Appliance.

We recently had him examined, and the doctor said the opening was entirely closed and that it wasn't necessary to wear it longer. Thanking you for your kindness. I am,

Mr. C. E. Brooks, Marshall, Mich.

Dear Sir:—Perhaps it will interest you to know that I have been ruptured six years and have always had trouble with it till I got your Appliance. It is very easy to wear, fits neat and snug, and is not in the way at any time, day or night. In fact, at times I did not know I had it on; it just adapted itself to the shape of the body and seemed to be a part of the body, as it clung to the spot, no matter what position I was in.

It would be a veritable God-send to the unfortunate who suffer from rupnate who suffer from rup-ture if all could procure the Brooks Rupture Ap-pliance and wear it. They would certainly never regret it.

You Should Send for Brooks

Rupture Appliance

1. It is absolutely the only Appliance of the kind on the market today, and in it are embodied the principles that inventors have sought after for years.

2. The Appliance for retaining the rupture cannot be thrown out of position. 3. Being an air cushion of soft rubber it clings closely to the body, yet never blisters or

4. Unlike the ordinary so-called pads, used in other trusses, it is not cumbersome or

It is small, soft and pliable, and positively cannot be detected through the clothing.

The soft, pliable bands holding the Appliance do not give one the unpleasant sensation of wearing a harness.

7. There is nothing about it to get foul, and when it becomes soiled it can be washed without injuring it in the least.

8. There are no metal springs in the Appliance to torture one by cutting and bruising the flesh.

All of the material of which the Appliances are made is of the very best that money can buy, making it a durable and safe Appli-

Help the Red Cross—the Great Battle Raging in France Is Overtaxing its Resources

HE greatest battle in all history, the decisive battle of this war, began March 21 in France and is still raging with increasing fury at the time this issue goes to press. Millions of men are engaged, including a large contingent of American troops sent into action within the last few days. The slaughter has been frightful. The killed and wounded are numbered by the hundred thousand. Though the larger losses were on the side of the attacking Germans, our allies have suffered severely and the relief of their wounded, including our own, is already overtaxing the combined resources of the Red Cross and the army hospital service. To meet the needs of this emergency the Red Cross has sent out a distress call for surgical dressings. The men, women and children of England, France and Italy are overworked and can do no more than they are now doing. Therefore it is the pressing duty of the women of America to respond to this appeal by speeding up to the utmost their Red Cross work.

The Kaiser has determined to make this the decisive battle of the war, and, viewed from the German standpoint, he has excellent reasons for staking all on his present desperate effort to win a crushing victory that would prostrate the free nations of the world at his feet. The war has imposed more severe privations on the people of Germany than on the people of the Allies, excepting those in the sections devastated by the German armies. The shortage of the necessaries of life in Germany has reached the point of impairing the health and strength of the people and they cannot much longer stand the strain. The entire nation, except the army, is on a starvation diet; cloth is so scarce that most of it has been commandeered for the army, and the citizens are compelled to resort to a considerable use of paper clothing; there is no tea, coffee, chocolate or rubber in the country; the supply of leather is hardly enough to shoe the soldiers, while the people are reduced to the extremity of wearing wooden shoes and many even have to go without socks. Because of the near exhaustion of resources Germany cannot prolong the struggle; but the Kaiser has another cogent reason for driving the war to a speedy conclusion. The treacherous desertion and infamous peace by Bolsheviki Russia has enabled Germany to withdraw two million soldiers from the eastern front and transfer them to the western front. With this enormous reinforcement the German army in France largely outnumbers the forces of the Allies, and the imperial butcher of Berlin is making quick use of this present advantage in a supreme effort to conquer before the full strength of the armies the United States is training can be brought into the conflict. Despite the heavy odds he is being held in check, and we are sending our help as fast as possible. This battle will go on for weeks, perhaps months, but we shall win. We must all help and especially by contributing liberally to the Red Cross fund which is to be raised this present May.

Some Questions Concerning Zone Rates Answered by Request

N Ohio doctor writes that, after reading our February and March editorials on zone rates of newspaper and magazine postage, there occur to him the following questions which he requests us to print and comment on. We are glad of the opportunity, offered by his challenge, to correct certain misstatements that have been persistently circulated by the enemies of the magazines, and to point out the fallacy of the misconception entertained by the Doctor and some others as to the proper functions and legitimate purposes of government. The Doctor asks:

Question.—"Why is it unfair for the Government to charge more to haul a ton of newspapers a thousand miles than to haul them fifty if it is fair for a company hauling coal to make such distinction?"

We believe our readers understand that there is a very important difference, which the Doctor fails to comprehend, between the hauling of freight by transportation companies and the dissemination of useful knowledge through the distribution of the newspapers and magazines by the Government instrumentality of the mails. It seems needless to explain why it is fair and indeed necessary for transportation companies to grade their rates according to distance. To say nothing of a living profit, they must at least earn their expenses which vary according to distance as also does the value of the service to their patrons. Therefore a fixed charge for all distances from fifty to one thousand miles would be too high for short hauls and too low for long hauls and unfair to all concerned. Their business is merely commercial and the law does not permit them to tax one patron for the benefit of another. Though the mails are an immense help to commerce they are designed to serve and do serve the higher and more important purpose of promoting the education and enlightenment of the people, chiefly through the distribution of newspapers and magazines. And this is an object of vital consequence to the well-being of the people and the very existence of the nation. Therefore a different principle applies to the conduct of the Post-Office establishment. It should not be operated as a money-making business, but as a function of Government for the utmost benefit of the people as a whole and for the general welfare of the nation. It was the illiteracy and dense ignorance of the great majority of the Russian people that caused the ruin of that once mighty nation. It is fair and right and necessary that, in our country in which the people have the power of self-government, the postage rates should be uniform throughout the land regardless of distance, so that the citizens in the most remote corners of the Union may have the educational benefit of newspapers and magazines at the same price as do those who dwell in or near the great cities, and if the cost of transportation on the long hauls exceeds the postage it is just and proper that the deficit should be made good from the tax revenues of the National treasury.

Question.—"If the papers are carried at less than cost do not those people who care nothing for them have to make up the deficit by some kind of tax, and is this fair?"

We believe that the Government does not sustain any loss on carrying the papers and magazines at the present level rate of one cent a pound but, if it does, of course the deficit has to be made up from some other source of revenue, and unquestionably it is fair for this purpose to tax those (if any there be) "who care nothing for" such reading matter. Those who care nothing for schools are taxed for their support regardless of whether they have children or not,—if they have we compel their children to go to school - and it is all fair and right because universal education is for the best interest of our country. But education does not properly end with school days. School is but the beginning of lifelong education, kept up through the newspapers and magazines. Our National and State Governments are expending millions on scientific research to discover better methods of agriculture and forestry, of combating the enemies of human, animal and plant life, and of improving our living conditions. the results of which, together with a vast amount of other useful information, reach the people through the columns of the newspapers and magazines. The person who cares nothing for newspapers and magazines is not likely to be a progressive, public-spirited or desirable citizen in any community, and this class of obstructionists should not be encouraged by making the magazines more costly through zone rate postage.

Question.—"Do not sealed letters carry intelligence, and would it not be possible to carry letters for one cent per ounce if the seventy million dollars lost annually to the P. O. Department by carrying second-class matter at a loss were saved?"

So that old falsehood long since disproved and discredited is still doing service in the interest of those who are trying to strangle the magazines! A Government commission, after a careful investigation, reported that the accounting system of the P. O. Department was such that it was impossible to determine the cost of transporting second-class mail matter, and Congressman Steenerson of Minnesota proved conclusively that these guesswork figures of supposed loss were not only absurdly wrong but impossible. One thing is certain—that the P. O. Department on its entire operations during the twelve months ending with June, 1917, made a net profit of nearly ten million (to be exact $9,836,211.90) dollars and turned this sum into the U.S. treasury. Rightly understood there is no loss to be saved on second-class matter at the present one-cent level rate; but we believe that the high zone rates, if permitted to go into effect, will cause a loss of postal revenue by cutting down the circulation of the magazines. Besides the second-class postage they pay, the magazines create an immense volume of first, third and fourth-class mail business. For instance, we receive a million letters a year from our subscribers, and we mail a large number of letters and circulars to them. The postage on this correspondence is a large sum, equal to the amount we pay for mailing Comport, but it is vastly exceeded by the correspondence that passes between our readers and advertisers resulting from advertisements in Comfort. A considerable cut in magazine circulation would necessarily result in a large reduction of postal revenue but would not much reduce the operating expenses of the P. O. Department. The wiping out of half the newspaper and magazine circulation would not do away with a single post office or mail routeand the cost of maintaining the rural mail routes is the same regardless of whether the driver carries one or a hundred pieces of mail on a trip. How is the Government to make a net saving or gain by prohibitive zone rates?

Zone Rate Scheme Is Not a War Tax

CONSCIENTIOUS and patriotic subscriber in Colorado writes that some of her friends, who would like to sign the petition for the repeal of the zone rates, hesitate to do so for tear the zone rate proposition might have been designed, like the raising of the letter postage rate, as a war revenue measure. The increase in the letter postage rate is a war tax and will be repealed after the close of the war, but the zone rate scheme was not intended for a war tax, as we explained in a previous editorial. Postmaster-General Burleson so stated in his annual report where he said that the zone rate law was intended as permanent postal legislation. It will remain a permanent fixture unless the people by their letters and petitions prevail on Congress to repeal it. You need have no fear of hindering war activities or embarrassing the finances of the Government by signing the petition. The magazine publishers are subject to the same war taxes that apply to other lines of business. Furthermore, they have declared their willingness to bear any increase of tax, even to the extent of giving over their entire profits during the war, if needed by the Government. It is the cruel injustice of the zone rates that they so strenuously object to, and at which the petitions are aimed. If an increase of second-class postage is needed during the war, let it be a level raise uniform throughout the country regardless of distance, so to bear equally on all and not oppressively on any, so not to punish those who live at a distance while exempting those who live near the place of publication. If these views meet with your approval sign and circulate the petition on page 16.

Garments Needed by Red Cross for French Orphan Babies

These layettes can be made by individuals at home. Each outfit contains two dresses, one jacket, cape with hood, two pairs bootees, two woolen blankets, three fiannel binders, three undershirts, one hood, twelve diapers and bag undershirts, one hood, twelve diapers and bag of sundries.

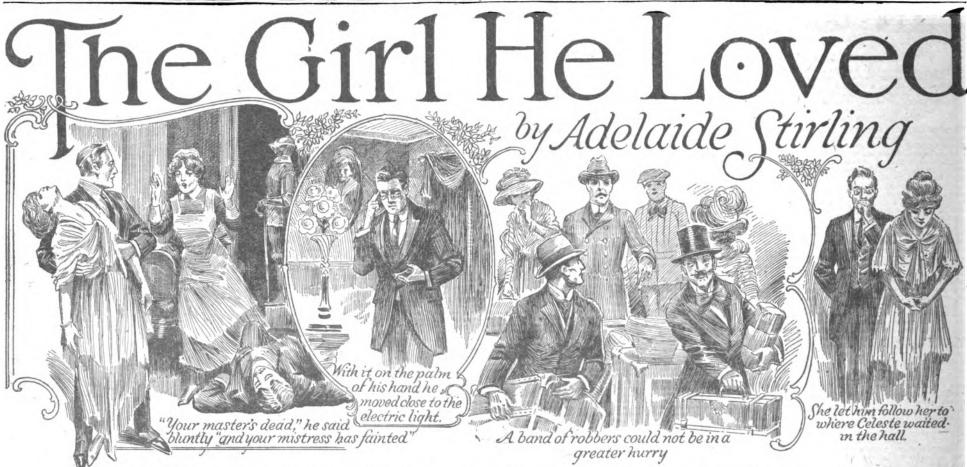

Too much emphasis can not be placed upon using the material indicated or only such sub-to bind off for next. Count stitches, from total number subtract 20, divide remaining number by two. For example having cast on 90 for back and 70 for each sleeve one has total of 230 stitches less 20, gives 110, half of which is 55.

From the wrist knit these 55 or whatever the number of stitches may be, slip off needle onto a pin or holder. Bind off 20 stitches for the seck, knit 55 or the remaining stitches, turn and knit 3 ribs on this sleeve from wrist to neck, then at neck end of work cast on 15 stitches, knit 20 ribs. Cast off loosely 20 or more stitches to correspond in number with the last lot of stitches cast on for sleeves.

Then knit 1 rib and cast off 15 stitches, repeat twice more or cast off 15 stitches 3 times. Knit rice which it is and cast of 16 stitches, repeat twice more or cast off 15 stitches 3 times. Knit 6 ribs on remaining stitches and slip on pin. Pick up stitches on opposite side and work to match side which is finished. Join fronts and work 6 ribs across from side to side. Follow

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Lady Annesley, stepmother to Sir Thomas and Ravenel Annesley, disapproves of Adrian Gordon, who is in love with Ravenel. Receiving an appointment to India Adrian seals his proposal and Ravenel's promise for an early marriage, by giving her a beautiful ring of diamonds and opals. Not daring to wear it she slips it on a ribbon on her neck. Ravenel bids Adrian good by, unconscious that their conversation, held near the edge of a quarry is heard by Lady Annesley's confidential maid. Four days later Ravend's received a conversation of their marriage. Lady Annesley, apparently anxious for flavened to make a good appearance at the party provides her with a new dress. Ravenel is unsuspicious of intrigue, but Sir Thomas, only sixteen, suspects the scheming woman and her designs on Lord Levallion, a former suitor for her hand, as Ravenel's future husband. Going to the party and not meeting Adrian, Ravenel, with a sob in her throat, wanders through the garden, where she meets Lord Levallion, not knowing it is he. Weary and wanting to go home he offers to take her there. Arriving home she hunts for the lost ring but does not find it. The next day Ravenel prepares for her wedding and waits for Adrian, where she meets Lord Levallion, of the later there is a drs. Gordon. ALONE WITH THE DEAD.

E'S poisoned; he's dying!"

It was many a day before any one in that room forgot the sound of Lady Levallion's voice. She crouched on the floor, holding Levallion as she had never satin gown.

E'S poisoned; he's dying!"

It was many a day before any one in that room forgot the sound of Lady Levallion's voice. She crouched on the floor, holding Levallion as she had never sating gown.

"Hush!" cried Chayter, roughly. "For God's sake, Scarsdale, send some one for a doctor!"—but some one had gone already.

In the horrid silence that had fallen on the room, each rattling breath Levallion drew sounded harder than the last. All the men were round him, there was a bustle of servants, a calling for useless remedies; but toward their hostess not one woman stirred. It was sinister, cominous, to see them crowded together in their smart gowns; a wide space between them and the overthrown liqueur-stand, and Ravenel huddled on the floor with a dying man in her arms. So it was that Doctor Houghton saw them, when at last he came. The bare floor, the rucked-up rugs, the litter of broken glass and silver round Lady Levallion—white as her gown, "against which Levallion's black clothes stood out in horrible limpness; and behind them and the kneeling men about them, that wall of silks and satins, of inimical women's faces. Even as he stooped and touched Levallion's hand, that picture stamped itself on Houghton's brain. "They think she did it," he thought, like lightning, as he wiped the froth from the stift lightning.

"They think she did it," he thought, like lightning, as he wiped the froth from the stiff lips.

"Clear the room!" he said. "Send the ladies away. No, not you!" as Ravenel only clutched Levallion more fiercely. But when they were gone he tried none of the remedies he had brought with him. Adrian Gordon, Lord Levallion, had been dead this half-hour past. Very gently Houghton laid the handsome, dark head back on Lady Levallion's knees; and no one, she least of all, saw it was the living face, and not the dead, that he looked at so long and steadily.

"They hate her, and, if I'm not careful, she'll be hanged because a handful of women don't like her," he thought, after that long look at the girl Levallion had married. It was part of his trade to read faces. This one, if he knew anything, was innocent. For no guilty woman would ever have been utterly unconscious of self as this girl was; or could have sat clinging to the dead man as she did.

"If she'd done it, she'd be crying on a sofa," he was thinking, even while he listened to Lord Chayter's story of what had happened. "Or if she had nerve enough to touch him, her face would show the strain. She'd bare her lower teeth like they all do when they're guilty."

"Don't whisper, Lord Chayter." she said sharply. "You can't wake him! Doctor Houghton, it was I brought him the bottle—and owed him everything! He was kind—to me."

Every man in the room but Houghton knew that she and Levallion had quarreled that very night; not one of them knew how they had made it up again. But at the dreary, tearless voice, perhaps, only Jimmy Scarsdale did not feel a lump in his throat.

"Don't talk," said Houghton, gently. "Never mind us. You could not help what was in the bottle."

"I—Jacobs frightened me," she said vaguely.

"I—Jacobs frightened me," she said vaguely.
"But, oh! why don't you do something?"
She looked up, caught Houghton's eyes, and felt frantically at Levallion's heart, that was felt frantically at Levallion's heart, that was stone cold.

"It doesn't beat!" she cried, like a frightened child. "I can't feel it. Levallion!" the cry rang out as it has done since the ages of ages; the useless, desperate call of the living to the dead. "Dear Lady Levallion," said Houghton softly, "he can't hear you! I got here too late."

She looked at him as if she were dazed. "Too late," she said; "it's all too late." She swayed forward till her face lay on the Levallion's breast that could shelter her no longer. "Let her lie!" said Houghton savagely. "It's the only kindness we can do her. Good God, are there no women in this house to come to her, that she is left to men? To me, who barely knows her?

"You sent the women away," said Scarsdale slowly.

slowly.

"And-if one of them had cared for her I might have ordered her out till I was black in the face." But he dared not say it aloud. He was tall, young, and strong; and he lifted Lady Levallion in his arms as if she had been a child. But, though he rang and rang her bedroom-bell, it was minutes before any one answered it. But the strong face of the French woman who came at last pleased him, also the little cry with which she ran to her mistress.

"Your master's dead," he said bluntly, "and your mistress has fainted. Help me to get her to bed. Where's Sir Thomas?" for it had suddenly come over him that Lady Levallion's brother was nowhere to be seen.

"He ran out after his dog that came raging denly come over him that Lady Levalion's brother was nowhere to be seen.

"He ran out after his dog that came raging through the servants' hall a long time ago. He knew nothing."

With quick fingers she was loosening Lady Levallion's gown. "Oh, Monsieur Houghton, I did go to the drawing-room door to help my lady, but Lady Chayter say to me you would not let me in. So I run out of doors to see if Sir Thomas is anywhere, and he is not."

"Don't try to rouse her too much," Houghton returned, as if he were thinking of something else. "I'll give her something to make her sleep, by and by."

"There's no doubt that he was poisoned and with some preparation of prussic acid." he with some preparation of the with the signal and the only at the probably had good reason to, if any kind friend had gird poor Levallion's past to her," The with some preparation of the way thing that came to his mind was the night a strange woman had come to the door, as well as the probably had good reason to, if any kind friend had gird poor Levallion's past to her," The thought with wrong-beaded shrewdness, "Any how, I me going to do my best for her till, if and show the was crossenging, "he'd like me to. Houghton could only shake his head.
Half a mile off, the only soul who would have she had only half-believed in.

"Get Miss Ravenel." she cried clearly, loudly.
"Get her, or they'll hang her."

ritifully.

"Lady Levallion, then!" the Umbrella clutched at the air as if to grasp the life that was leav-

"I want to tell—I—" She turned suddenly rigid, a dreadful stiff figure, only its eyes alive.
"Tell her they'll murder him! they—" She fell forward on the bed. -" She turned suddenly

A DEAD MAN'S SWEETHEART.

"Levallion's drawing-room!" said Houghton to himself, bitterly. "Inside his own house, that fools say is a man's safest place."

Houghton if he thought there might be some one among the house-party who could not get away fast enough.

"A band of robbers could not be in a greater hurry!" he thought, bitterly. And then his face lit up.
Some one inside the drawing-room door threw it open. A voice Houghton knew said authoritatively:
"What's this, gentlemen? Surely you understand no one and no luggage," emphatically, "is to leave this house till I hold my inquest."
It was Doctor Aston, the coroner. But before Houghton could move toward him a hand caught his arm.
"I went for him." Sir Thomas Annesley looked fifty years old. "Was it right?"
Houghton nodede. But it came over him sud-incongruity of the whole thing came over him.

"I went for him." Sir Thomas Annesiey looked fifty years old. "Was it right?"

Houghton nodded. But it came over him suddenly that if there were things he did not know, the coming of the coroner would be the beginning of the end for Lady Levallion.

"Go to your sister." he said, gently. "But, stop! What's this about your dog frightening her. and——"
"Nothing," said Tommy, drearily. "He went up with her, and I suppose he saw a cat or something. I found him raising Cain in the kitchen, and some one opened the door and let him out. I ran after him, but I lost him. When I came back they said you were with "Ravenel, and I suppose he kissed his lips, his back they said you were with "Ravenel, and I suppose he saw a cat or something." I found him raising Cain in the kitchen, and some one opened the Ravenel, and I will have a strange passion she kissed his lips, his back they said you were with "Ravenel, and I suppose he saw a cat or something." I suppose he saw a cat or something. I found him raising Cain in the kitchen. What am I to do?" she was muttering. "Levallion, what am I to do?" where the living and the dead. The awful incongruity of the whole thing came over him. The man's own drawing-room, all flowers and silk hangings and carved ivory, where, instead of rose-colored lamps, four unshaded candles of rose vallion, what am I to do?"

With a strange passion she kissed his lips, his shut eyes.

"You believed in me, you trusted me," she said, very low, but in the silent room the whisper carried. "Oh, wherever you are, trust me still! Even if I—hold my tongue."

Doctor Houghton felt suddenly and physically sick. Then he remembered he had no right to have listened. No right to judge any woman who was mad with grief, as this one was. He went to her, to try and get her away, and something in her attitude made the suspicion in him die down again. Lady Levallion was crouched close to the dead man's breast, pressed to him as a child in trouble to his mother. Whatever she meant to be silent about, it was not any guilt of her own. For, as if it were her only refuge, she was clutching Levallion's body. "Come to your brother," said Houghton softly. "Come away."

"I only want Levallion." she said very pitifully.

"Come away

"Come away."

"I only want Levallion," she said very pitifully.
"He was kind to me," in the old parrot cry. "Let me stay with him."

The man nodded, because he could not speak.
In spite of himself, he was assured that even if Lady Levallion got up at the inquest and swore that she herself had killed her husband, it would not be true.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

To not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address Mrs. Wheeler Wilkinson, Care Comfort, Augusta, Maine.

HAT was your best vacation, and why?

This is hardly vacation season, but it will be by the time the May number is sent out and answers to the above question are received and printed. By "best vacation" I mean something within the limits of ordinary working people who have only two or three weeks' time and a small amount of money to spend. Don't think your vacation was too unimportant and too uninteresting to write about, for it may be the very idea that will help someone else, and that is what our department is for, isn't it?—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Somewhere in France.

Will you kindly print this letter? I wish to thank all the Comport sisters who have written me such kind and cheerful letters. I wish I could write to each one personally and make her understand what letters are to the boys so far from home; we don't have much spare time over here and this letter will have to do for all. I want to thank each one for the fine parcels, which I have shared with the boys who are not as lucky as I am.

I would like to tell you something about army life, but that isn't allowed. Again I say I thank you for your kindness to my dear mother and me, and to the boy readers of Comport, "Come on, boys, the water's fine."

Private Guy Englesby.—You are the first man to gain entree into our circle, as we have made it a rule never to print letters from men, although we frequently receive very interesting ones, but in this instance I think we are justified in breaking that rule and we hope you will find time for another letter to us. May God watch over you and keep you, is the prayer of COMFORT'S staff and its many readers.—Ed.

Dear Composer Sisters:

Tell me please, has Mrs. Wilkinson a goat who holds the same office and performs the same duties as does Uncle Charlie's Billy the Goat? I almost believe she has, as I made an attempt some time ago to get into your circle by letter but met with failure. It's a waste basket, is it? Well, I believe I prefer a goat, for a waste basket seems the receptacle of only that which is beneath notice. While I'm quite sure my letter was of that type, I don't want the others to think so, too. And here I am telling you about it. But in spite of the reception she gave my letter, Mrs. Wilkinson is a dear, and we can't all get space for our letters, can we?

so, too. And here I am telling you about it. But in spite of the reception she gave my letter, Mrs. Wilkinson is a dear, and we can't all get space for our letters, can we?

Sisters I wish to make a plea for home charity and the supreme charity of the world. Let's have more of it in our hearts and manifested, in our lives. Our Savior teaches us that charity is the greatest and most beautiful virtue of the soul and life. How the world needs the supreme charity at this point of its history, and it is something all can have and give; the most humble but dweller can and may contribute to its treasury. Let me quote from the pen of William George Jordan. His words far more fitly describe and explain this charity than mine. This is from his book entitled, "The Kingship of Self-Control." It is a small book, judged by dimensions and weight, but a great book in theory and lesson. Read it. This is what he says: "Giving food, clothing and money to the poor is gally the beginning of real charity. Charity has higher, purer forms of manifestation. Charity is but an instinctive reaching out for justice in life. Charity seeks to smooth down the rough places of living, to bridge the chasms of human sin and folly, to feed the hearthungry, to give strength to the struggling, to be tender with human weakness, and greatest of all, it means obeying the divine injunction, "Judge not." We never see the target a man aims at in life: we only see the target he hits. We judge from results. We condemn unheard our dear friends around us on mere circumstantial evidence. We know nothing of the trials, sorrows and temptations of those around us, of pillows wet with tears, of the life tragedy that may be hidden behind a smile, of the secret cares, struggles and worries that shorten life. There are times with some of us when life seems a living death from which there is no relief and when we seem isolated and separated from the rest of humanity as if we were living on another planet."

Dear friends, let's keep all these facts in mind when prone t prone to judge others and instead of judges the helping hand the kind word or even just a cheerful, friendly smile.

About the home charity. Don't you think we, in our zeal to help the suffering ones across the great waters, are likely to forget those at our own doors who sadly need our help? Let's remember them too. I'm not discouraging the giving of aid to the war sufferers, far from it, for I think it a grand and good work, but don't forget those of our homeland.

We should make a greater effort than ever to be cheerful, to give comfort and encouragement to the sad hearts which are around us, the lonly ones who have dear once in our camps or in France. I know we feel less like being cheerful than ever but let's bravely fight and help at home while our young men are bravely fighting for us at the front.

I get very lonely, so would like to receive letters from any between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-five. Will answer all I can.

Long live Comfort and all connected with it.

Miss Zella Prichard.

MISS ZELLA.—It's a waste basket, but do not bemoan the fate of your first letter, for somewhere I have read that Kipling's "Recessional" was rescued from the waste basket by his wife, and there are other gems of literature that have been rejected or consigned to waste baskets only to become famous later. Perhaps your letter belonged to that class. We'll think so anyway, so come again.—Ed.

every one. Here is a Troubled Wife, from Kentucky, whose heart yearns for affection from a husband who has little use for such foolishness. How many there are in this world, suffering from that same tack of love. The best advice I can give is this. Meet him half way, make him want you, he just as independent as he is this will nearly crush you, but you will soon learn by wrik accound him with the same attitude he shows toward you. You wouldn't want what did not come from the heart, therefore if he has no love in his heart for you, you don't want pretension.

Next cones a New Jersey sister who is hearing the great burden of lonellness and him lity because the one she hoped to wed was a slacker. Sister, read and look around you and see what you have escaped in the way of sadness and trouble, then tune up that whistle and loose your trouble and soul disturbling forms.

"Sing away your trouble and soul disturbing fears; Sintle away your sorrows, your heart-aches and your tears
Let the sunshine follow you through all the coming

Sing a song of gladness forever.

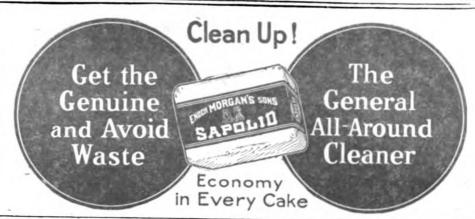

"Look above the trials that abound on every hand; Keep a stock of courage always at command, Sometime in the future you will understand— Sing a song of gladness forever.

"When the day is gloomy, songs will make it bright; When the burden's heavy, smiles will make it ligh Sunshine will follow in the trail of darkest night— Sing a song of gladness forever.

"Just a song of sunshine, let it flood the heart,
And the bars of sorrow it will rend apart;
Whisper words that courage in some soul will start—
Sing a song of gladness forever."

Sing a song of gladness forever."

To those longing for and not receiving attentions, would say—get busy. Raise something—chickens, vegetables, flowers, orphans, and, above all things, read. There is nothing to soothe a crushed heart like work. Then remember the story of King David, who wanted to build a house for his lord. But his lord had something else for him to do, and that something else was better than David had planned. To the husbands of these heart-hungry women, why did you marry? You would have fought your way through fire or snow to be there on your wedding day. That which you thought was everlasting affection seems to have been only a bonfire. Remember, a woman's nature requires love, and if you do not supply her with that love there are always those who are willing and then God pity both.

Many are living lives of duty without a word of praise or affection, just plodding along. I know one woman who is no more than a slave. Her husband was eager to marry her, but now, living on a farm of five hundred acres, she is left alone for days and sometimes weeks to do all the work, at seasons when he works with machinery on other farms. She gets nothing but snarls. She has no near neighbors and when she falls behind with her sewing or housework, he asks what she was doing that she didn't get it done. Sisters, make the best of your lives and remember there are heavier burdens untold.

Wishing you success, Mas. HATTIE D. MILLER.

we are changed in many ways at twenty-nine from what we used to be and it isn't always sadness or sorrow that makes the change either. Why look forward to such a lonely life? I've often heard that very few marry their first love. I didn't, and I am happier now than when I was a girl.

If you don't think you could adopt a child and do justice by it, why not adopt a mother or an aunt, for there are many elderly women who would be glad to share your home and your love, no matter how humble the home might be, for they are just as lonely as you and need your love, for love counts and an institute is not a home. Don't you think if you ask God that He will show you what your work is? Write me some time.

He will show you what your work is: Wille he some time.

M. B., dear little friend, write me asking any questions you like and I will do my best to help you.

ICE lends variety to our wheatless and meatless days and while in itself it lacks the necessary protein, fat and flavoring to make up a well-balanced meal, that can be supplied by the addition of milk, cheese, eggs and meat, with butter and tomatoes for fat and flavoring, though the latter may be governed by your tastes and pocketbook, as bacon fat and onions, or anything else that your food shelves contain, will answer the purpose equally as well. For sweet dishes add syrup or preserved fruits.

Pick over carefully and wash thoroughly one cup of rice and put it in one quart of boiling salted water and let it boil for fifteen minutes, shaking the pan instead of stirring the rice. Try it by pinching a few grains between the fingers. If the grains are plump and soft, drain off the water and set the dish uncovered, on the back of the stove. Two teaspoons of lemon juice added to the water in which rice is boiled makes it whiter.—Ed.

Lady Prescott, wife of Sir Athelstone Prescott, and her son Raymond, while traveling by coach, lose their way, and night overtaking them, they stop at a miserable, inn, in a little fishing village on Flamborough Head. They are attracted to a little girl, Sibyl, who waits on them. Her winning ways, her admittance of the cruel blows given by Mistress Sloan, and that her own mother would not do it, convince them that he innkeeper is not her father, and they determine to take the child away. Seeking Mistress Sloan, and that her own mother would not do it, convince them that the innkeeper is not her father, and they determine to take the child away. Seeking Mistress Sloan, they learn that a woman who had been in a railroad smash up and injured leaves the child, who for weeks cries for Nansie. Mistress Sloan, for the consideration of thirty pounds, consents to let the child go, muttering she will keep her secrets. That night Sibyl is awakened and overhears Jem and his wife talking over the terms of the bargain, and through a chink in the wall she detects the place where an invaluable trinket, belonging to her, is concealed. The next morning she secures it. To Lady Prescott she traces three letters "S. H. S.," which she dmily temembers and which convinces Lady Prescott that the gem is Sibyl's, and by it she may be restored to her own people. Five years later, her nineteenth birthday, Lady Prescott Introduces her to society. She clasps a beautiful chain, to which is suspended the trinket, around her neck and with Raymond they seek the drawing-room, where with Lady Prescott Sibyl assists in receiving the guests. Raymond, watching and anxious, admits to his mother how beautiful Sibyl is, and that no one attracts him as she does, and that his mother has the first right to his confidence. She will like nothing better than to keep her children with her. Sibyl is Introduced to Miss Ada Therwin, the adopted daughter of Count Egbert Shirley and the gu

CHAPTER XV. THE BETROTHAL.

AYMOND led Sibyl to the picture gallery—a long, narrow room, exquisitely finished and furnished, and containing an exceedingly rare and costly collection of paintings, statuary and bric-a-brac of every description.

The young couple passed from piece to piece, enjoying to the utmost the beauties surrounding them on every hand.

"What a delightful day this has been!" sighed Sibyl, as they stood before the last picture, bestowing at the same time an unconscious look of gratitude and pleasure upon Raymond, as if, somehow, he had been the author of it all.

"Do pictures give you so much pleasure, then?" he asked, leading her out through a wide arch toward the conservatory.

"Yes, pictures, and—everything," she answered, softly.

"What a happy child you are princess to be

"Yes, pictures, and—everything," she answered, softly.

"What a happy child you are, princess, to be so easily amused," Raymond exclaimed, with a laugh and a fond glance.

"How can one be otherwise than happy when the world is so beautiful and everybody so delightful?"

"I trust that the glasses through which you view the world will never lose their couleur de rose. I fear, however, that when you begin your mission of charity, you will think there are some dark blots upon its fairness," Raymond said, gravely.

"Not for me, Ray, if I can only brighten or beautify it ever so little for others."

Raymond looked into the fair face beside him, while a sort of awe stole over him.

There were depths here of which he had never dreamed.

"Who taught you these things, princess?" he

There were depths here of which he had never dreamed.

"Who taught you these things, princess?" he asked, with a thoughtful, earnest look.

"I do not think any one ever particularly taught me to think of these things; they come to me—they always came to me. Sometimes I think the sea gave them to me to beautify my lonely childhood, for I used to sit hours on the rocks and listen to the gentle lapping of the waters against their rugged sides, and it always seemed as if voices were talking with me."

"Shall I tell you what the sea always talks to me about?" he asked with a luminous smile.

neath the paim yonder, for it is a long story, princess."

He led her to a beautiful spot—a sort of semicircular bower, formed by several choice paim trees, within which there was an inviting seat, just wide enough for two to sit comfortably.

Raymond's face assumed a graver look than usual as he seated himself beside his companion and glanced somewhat anxiously into her unconscious countenance.

He had resolved that the most important question of his life's happiness should be decided now.

But notwithstanding this decision, his lips for the moment were sealed, and he fell into thoughtful musing.

"Well, Ray, what does the sea say to you?" Sibyl asked, as the silence was becoming awkward, and wondering what had made him grow so suddenly absent and serious.

"It speaks to me of a great many grand and benutiful things, dear, although I do not think? I have ever received such spiritual impressions as you speak of. But there is one train of thought which is always suggested whenever I hear its roar, and see its bright and sparkling waves. He paused a moment as if uncertain how to go on; then continued:

"It takes me back in spirit to the chill November day, when, cold and weary, and out of temper, I was obliged to spend the night at a certain into no a bleak and dismal coast. I always see a sweet child, abused, neglected, but meekly fulfilling her wretched and unfitting task. I always hear a little suppressed cry of pain, and see the look of forced and proud endurance, which then, as always, made me miserable over the suffering I had unwittingly caused. I recall the haughty resentment and scornful rejection of my peace-offering, and I received a lesson at that time concerning almsgiving, which I have never forgotten. I see a little form flitting here and there, careful, attentive, and deft at serving the weary strangers—I hear a sob over the dead 'Lily of Astolat,' and note the rapt, breathless attention which follows the fortunes of Sir Lancelot and Queen' Guinevere."

Sibyl here laid her hand upon Raymond's arm, and he could feel the quiver which ran through every slender finger.

He captured that soft hand in a firm, strong reassuring clasp, while a deep tenderness crept into the words which followed.

"I have only a little more to tell you, Sibyl, but here is a reason why I want you to know how, step by step, I have followed and watched over you ever since—how, little by little, this strange waif, of w

"Will it give me the blessed boon I crave?"

Her eyes were cast down, and she sat so still, and apparently unmoved, that, but for the fierce throbbing of her pulses, which Raymond could feel through the delicate glove, she would have seemed like some beautiful pleece of sculpture.

As for Sibyl herself, a solemn wonder had taken ported into another and more beautiful existent and the glory of it had, for the moment of the princes, which he world.

As for Sibyl herself, a solemn wonder had taken possession of her.

It seemed as if she had suddenly been transported into another and more beautiful existence, and the glory of it had, for the moment, dazzled and bewildered her.

Now she knew why his every tone had thrilled her so since his return, and she had so jealously wrapped herself in her mantle of reserve lest he should discover it.

She loved this grand, kingly man, and had been growing to love him all these years!

"Sibyl!"

The deep, tender, beseeching tones brought her to herself.

She started, and wave after wave of rich color

She started, and wave after wave of rich color swept over brow and cheek, neck and arms.

The dark lashes quivered irresolutely for a moment, and then her clear, truthful eyes sought

"Ray"—and his heart leaped at the new sweetness in her tones, low as they were—"I never dreamed until this moment that you could love me thus, nor that the feeling which has been growing in my own heart for you was—love!"

A sudden glad light transfigured Raymond Prescott's whole face at this ingenuous though rether direct confession.

"Yes, do, please; it seems as if it must speak to everybody." she answered.
"Come with me, then, to that rustic seat beneath the palm yonder, for it is a long story, princess."

He led her to a beautiful spot—a sort of semicircular bower, formed by several choice palm trees, within which there was an inviting seat, just wide enough for two to sit comfortably.
Raymond's face assumed a graver look than usual as he seated himself beside his companion and glanced somewhat anxiously into her unconscious countenance.

He had resolved that the most important question of his life's happiness should be decided now.

But notwithstanding this decision, his lips for the receipt that the rest is the receipt the receipt the receipt the receipt that the rest is the receipt the receipt the receipt the receipt the receipt the receipt that the rest is the substitute of the receipt the receipt the receipt that the rest is the substitute that the receipt the receipt that the rest is the substitute that the receipt the receipt the receipt the receipt the receipt that the receipt the receipt the receipt the receipt the receipt that the receipt the receipt the receipt that the receipt that the receipt that the receipt the

"I hope, however, you will be better satisfied with the way I shall keep this one," she said, flushing.

"I shall certainly take care that you fulfill it soon, and in a way to satisfy me, too, my princess," Raymond returned, with a meaning look, which made her happy eyes droop quickly again. "What a beautiful view you have of the conservatory from here!" interrupted a voice close beside them.

Raymond turned quickly, and saw Miss Therwin standing so near that her white draperies lay against his foot.

He bit his lips with vexation at being thus disturbed, and wondered how long she had been there, and how much she had heard.

Sibyl, however, seemed not in the least disturbed: beyond her first quick, startled glance, she had not betrayed any embarrassment, and, looking full in Miss Therwin's eyes, she replied, with a smile:

"Yes, and I think it is the loveliest hothouse I was ever in. Are you fond of flowers?"

"Exceedingly," Miss Therwin responded, with a searching glance into the pure face.

It was so calm, so unconscious, that she heaved an involuntary sigh of relief.

"There can have been no love passages." she said to herself, "or she would not be so selfpossessed."

Said to hears, possessed."

She had yet to learn a great deal more regarding Sibyl's powers of self-control.

"I have been looking for you," she continued, with her eyes still upon her beautiful face, "to tell you that I will call for you at eleven to-morrow." I forgot to name the hour this morning."

morrow. I forgot to name the hour this morning."

"Thank you. I will be ready. Are you enjoying yourself tonight?"

"Quite well; and you?"

"Very, much," Sibyl answered, with a little heightening of her color, which Ada did not fall to notice.

"My darling, do you not think I have been very considerate and patient?" Raymond asked, taking Sibyl's fair face in both his hands, and bending toward her.

They had just returned from Lady Wilton's, and he drew her gently back as she was about going upstairs to her own rooms.

"In what respect, Ray?" she asked with a smile.

She was ready and waiting, and Raymond came out with her, carefully assisting her into the sleigh, and tucking the robes securely around her.

her.
There was an air of proprietorship and tenderness in the young man's manner, and a new-brightness in Sibyl's face today, which Miss Therwin did not fail to remark and deplore with inward eavageness.

Therwin did not fail to remark and deplore with inward savageness.

"What have you been doing to yourself this morning, Sibyl?" she asked, with a searching glance, adding, with a secret sneer:

"It seems to me that you blossom out like a flower more and more every day."

"What a pretty compliment, Ada!" laughed the happy girl, wholly unconscious of the jealous anger which her matchless beauty aroused in her companion's heart. "And," she added, with a conscious blush, as she met Raymond's eye, "it is quite a rarity to receive anything of the kind from one's own sex, I believe."

"Then you'll credit me with being exceedingly open-hearted, I hope," she said, wondering what the girl would think if she could really read her heart.

heart.

Then, turning to Raymond, she continued:
"Mr. Prescott, I shall have to get you to impart to me the secret of this young lady's beautifying process, or I shall soon be losing all the honors which I have hitherto gained."

"Which request implies that you believe I am acquainted with Sibyl's mysteries in that matter," Raymond replied, with an amused smile, and a sparkle of mischlef in his eyes, as he turned them upon his betrothed.

"Do you keep her in a conservatory?" demanded Ada, remarking the delicate pink which was creeping into Sibyl's cheeks.
"I cannot be so ungallant as to betray any secrets, Miss Therwin," laughed Raymond; "but of one thing I can assure you, that we do not believe in hothouse development; it is dangerous, to say the least," and he gave Sibyl's hand a little squeeze under cover of the buffalo, to remind her off Miss Therwin's interruption in the conservatory at Lady Wilton's the night before.

Evidently Miss Therwin understood that he was shooting a lance at her, for she changed color ever so little.

"I agree with you there, Mr. Prescott. Hothouse productions are not lasting—their growth is too rapid and unnatural, and they soon die," she retorted.

Raymond smiled, but the look in his eye did not betray any fear that the hope which had bloomed for him last night in Lady Wilton's hothouse would soon die.

"Are you warm, princess?" he asked.
"I should be very unappreciative if I should say I am not after all your care," she replied.
"Very well, then, be careful of yourself, and come back as safely as you start," and touching his hat, he watched them as they went smoothly flying down the street.

"Mr. Prescott is very fond of you, Sibyl, is he not?" Ada remarked, after they were well on their way.

"I suppose it is natural he should feel a care over me, considering that we have been members of the same family so long," Sibyl answered, quietly, but the heavy lashes hid the tender light which Miss Therwin's words had called into her dark eyes.

"He is considerably older than you, I believe."
"Yes—seven years."

"Ah! quite a disparity. But do you know, dear, I think him the grandest man I have ever seen?"

Sibyl could not then have told why, but this high tribute to her lover grated harshly on her agars and she

"Yes—seven years."

"Ah! quite a disparity. But do you know, dear, I think him the grandest man I have ever seen?"

Sibyl could not then have told why, but this high tribute to her lover grated harshly on her ears, and she made no reply.

A ride of fifteen or twenty minutes brought them to Algeria street, and the sleigh stopped before a plain, brick tenement house.

"This is the place," Ada remarked, as they alighted, "and I hope you will find your charge interesting; she appeared like quite a nice body to me."

The block was inhabitated by a class of operatives, who, during good times, managed to live quite comfortably upon their moderate earnings; but when business was dull, and provisions and rent unabated in their prices, to "make both ends meet" was a matter that puzzled the most rigid economist among them.

Miss Therwin led the way up two flights of stairs, and rapped upon the first door on the right of the hall.

A low voice bade them enter, which they did, and found themselves in a good-sized room, comfortably carpeted and furnished.

Leading from this, Sibyl saw another room, which appeared to be used as a kitchen, for there was a cooking-stove in it, and a large cupboard, with glass doors, which contained dishes.

Near a sunny window, in a large rocking-chair, sat a rather stout, dark-haired, pale-faced woman, clad in a soft gray wrapper, with folds of snowy lace crossed upon her bosom. A spotless and tasteful cap adorned her hair, which lay in great rich waves against her brow.

Her eyes were large, bright, and of midnight blackness, and but for her face, which was rather pale, Sibyl thought her new charge appeared to be in very good health and condition.

Judith, for we recognize her at once as the lace peddler who visited Ada but a short time previous, and who must hereafter be known as Mrs. Stillman, shot one swift, searching glance into the young girl's fresh, beautiful face, and then turned with a cold, hard stare to Miss Therwin.

"Good morning, Mrs. Stillman," that lady sweetly remarked. "I ho somewhat curt reply. Ada here introduced Sibyl, saying:

"Miss Prescott has kindly volunteered to assist me in some of my duties, as I find I have a good deal on my hands just at present, and hoping you might like each other, I have brought her to you. You will find her very sympathetic, I assure you."
"The young lady is very kind, I am sure," Mrs. Stillman remarked, fixing her large dark eyes upon Sibyl's face.
As she met her look, the young girl felt as sudden thrill; it was so fixed and peculiar. Then she saw her start violently, and her eyes fill with tears.
"What did you say your name was?" she asked, in a sort of breathless way.

"What did you say your name was?" she asked, in a sort of breathless way.
"Prescott—Sibyl Prescott."
"Sibyl?" was the eager question, accompanied with a repressed sob.
"Yes," Sibyl answered, gently, wondering if the name had any painful associations for her. Then she asked:

Saves Time and Labor, Economizes Fuel, Does Better than a Stove for Many Foods, Cooks While You Are Asleep or Otherwise Occupied and Gives You a Cool Kitchen in Summer.

HE way two women "used their heads to save their heels" is tool in the description of this home-made fireless cooker, which solved the problem of how a forenoon could be spent out of the kitchen and yet serve the family with a properly prepared noon meal. Another discovery was the fact that the fireless cooker effected a tremendous saving in both labor and fuel, and that flavors which ordinarily escaped in steam were retained in the food.

The principle of a fireless cooker must be well understood before attempting its construcfireless cooker must be well understood before attempting its construction, which is nothing more or less than a box lined with insulating material which prevents the escape of the heat from the hot food placed within it.

When constructing a cooker, it adds but little labor to make a partition across the center so to divide it into two compartments, which greatly increases its usefulness. Fit the space on one side of the partition for use of a large enameled kettle with close-fitting cover to prevent the steam escaping, which is most service-able. 'Arrange the other compartment to hold two closely covered shallow tin pails, one on top of the other, so that two kinds of food may be cooking at the same time in this compartment. The large kettle will be of sufficient size to hold several glass jars, in which rice, cereals, dried fruits, etc. may all cook at once, with boiling water in the bottom of kettle. The fuller the containers, the better the food will cook, and of equal importance is to have the containers fit the cooker quite closely, as any air space will have a tendency to lower the retained heat, some, which require long cooking, need additional heat in the cooker, which is supplied by means of hot soapstones or field stones or metal disks, or even bricks will do. While the food is heating on the stove, heat the stones to a stzzling heat, but not too hot, and when ready to transfer the food place one hot stone in the bottom of the cooker, letting the food container rest on this, and place another hot stone on top of the container. Then cover quickly Experience soon teaches how to operate the cooker successfully.

A home-made cooker, with proper care in its construction, and operation should prove a useful and helpful saver of time and fuel; but the factory-made fireless cookers, which can be had in any size de sired,, and equipped with a variety of specially adapted and fitted cooking utensils, containers, heating disks and other appliances, are so much more useful and convenient and in every way so far superior to the home product that they are well worth the difference in cost to the housewife who has the price.

Care of Cooker

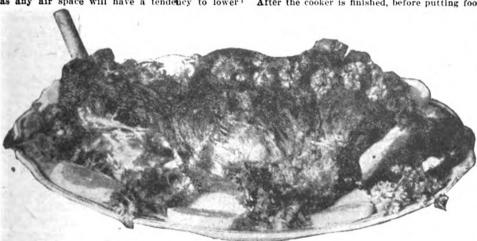

Leave the cooker open

Leave the cooker open when not in use, with when not in use, with as a certain amount of moisture accumulates during the cooking and should be dried out.

The food should be removed from the containers as soon as cooked, that they may be washed, scalded and dried in sun or over range. Tin rusts easily, but with good care will last a long time.

Line the box, sides and bottom, with sheet asbestos, lapping all edges several inches to make it tight. Now put a layer of chopped hay into the bottom, pounding it in as closely as possible, six inches deep, and cover with sheet asbestos. In each compartment, make a funnel-shaped inner wall of sheet asbestos to fit the respective containers; in no place should these inner walls come within six inches of the box. Pack closely with chopped hay the space between the inner walls and the box and partitions. Cover the packing with a sheet of asbestos cut to fit the inside of the box and with holes cut to fit the inside of the box and with holes cut to fit the scribed as a boxed mattress, six inches thick and large enough to very closely fill the box, fitting well down onto the partition and inner walls. It is made of the asbestos filled with hay. The wooden cover has strips nailed on the four sides that lap over the box and bind well when closed. The idea of fireless cooking is derived from the primitive method of baking in the ground, where conserved heat entirely does the work.

the temperature, and for these reasons it is well to decide on the size of palls or kettles before beginning the construction of the cooker. Also allow space for soapstone, field stones or bricks, top and bottom, if they are to be used, which is highly advisable, for they adapt the cooker to a much wider range of cooking by adding an extra source of heat.

The cooker is best adapted to those foods which require boiling and steaming, and long cooking, such as cereals, soups, meats, vegetables, dried fruits, steamed breads and puddings.

When several different foods are cooked at one time, they must require the same amount of cooking, since the cooker must not be opened to take out part, as a large amount of heat will escape.

Recipes for Fireless Cooking Cereals

ROLLED OAIS.—To every two cups of boiling water, add one level teaspoon of sait and one as ant cup of oats. Cook ten minutes on the stove, and then put into cooker over night. If a small quantity is used, put oats into jar with boiling water in pail.

CORN MYAL MUSIL—Three and one half cups of boiling water, or equal parts of milk and water, and one teaspoon of sait. Slowly stir in one cup of corn meal, wet with a very little water to prevent lumping. Cook about ten minutes on stove, or until it thekens, and then jout into cooker over night. The long cooking of cereals greatly improves their flavor and digestibility. All cereals are cooked the same, starting the cooking on the stove with the right amount of water and remaining over night in the cooker, or six hours during the day.

BOLLED RICE.—Wash rice and rinse. To each cup, allow four cups of boiling water and half a teaspoon of sait. Boil five minutes, stirring constantly, then remove to cooker for three hours, or longer if the cooker should not be opened.

Soup Stock.—Cut meat fine and split up the bones well. Cover with cold water, bring slowly to a boil and slowly cook ten minutes. Remove to cooker over night. In the morning, strain and remove fat, and use as a foundation for rice, macaroni or vegetable soups.

Vegetable Soup without Stock.—One half cup each of onion, carrot, turnip and cabbage cut in small pieces. Cook den minutes with three tablespoons of butter, stirring frequently. Add one cup of sliced potato and cook a few minutes longer. Add three cups of tomato fuice, put into cooker container and boil five minutes. In a sauce pan put one tablespoon of butter with one of dry flour, and when blended add one quart of boiling water, one quarter of a teaspoon of pepper, two level teaspoons of salt, a little parsley and celery seed crushed, and pour over vegetables. Cook ten minutes slowly and put into cooker six hours.

Cons Sour.—Bring to a boiling point one can of corn and one quart of milk. While this is being done, fry one tablespoon of coopped onion in three tablespoons of butter, and add two tablespoons of flour, stirring until smooth. Add the hot milk and corn, bring to boiling point, and put into cooker two hours.

Dead Bean or Split Pea Sours. Soak in cold water six or eight hours. Drain, and to each cup of beans or peas measured before soaking, add four cups of cold water. Bring to boiling point and cook half an hour, then put into cooker for over night or six hours. If not tender, reheat and return to cooker. Press through fine sleve, and add half a teaspoon of salt, one tablespoon of butter melted with a tablespoon of flour, one cup of milk, and a little onion juice if desired, to every cup of raw beans. Cook five minutes on top of stove and serve. A piece of lean salt pork, bacon or ham bone, when cooked with the soup gives a richer flavor.

Meats

Meats

Roast Mutton.—Take a small leg of mutton. First remove the pink outer skin, as this contains the strong flavor. Remove the caul. Dredge with flour and sprinkle with salt and pepper after wiping dry. Put into moderately hot oven until seared, and hot all through without water in pan. Remove to container into which the mutton will fit the closest; and it will probably be advisable to remove the leg bone, which should be done before putting into oven. Add sufficient boiling water for grayy. Cover tightly and set on stove until water boils; then remove to cooker, where it should remain four hours. Thicken gravy with flour and season. This process of cooking makes mutton sweet and tender.

Pot Roast.—Select any cut of meat. That in back of the rib is less expensive and the cooker makes it tender and delicious. Cut into small portions and sear in fat taken from the edges of the roast. Use frying pan for this. Partly cover with boiling water and simmer slowly for ten minutes. Remove to container, cover and set on stove until it boils again, and then place in cooker four hours. A little rice or vegetables may be added if desired; if rice, add more boiling water. Thicken gravy with flour before serving, or it may be added before meat is put into cooker.

Roast Fowl.—Chicken, turkey, duck, or other tough fowl, is made tender and the flavor much improved by the long, slow process of cooking. Prepare for roasting, slowly pour boiling water over every part of the fowl, which will give the skin a cooked appearance. Simmer about fifteen minutes in this water, or until the fowl is cooking then remove to container, cover and put into cooker for six or eight hours. Over night is the better plan. Drain, stuff if desired, and brown in a quick oven. Thicken gravy with flour or reserve the liquor for a rice soup.

Brown Fricasser of Chicken.—Joint the chicken and roll each plece in flour, sprinkle with salt and pepper, and brown in fat. Remove chicken from frying pan, one piece at a time, so the water will not stop boiling, a

Dear Friends:

Do any of you know of a homeless little girl that needs a mother's love and care? If so, will you let me know about her. We have been looking for a little one for over a year but so far have not found her. Our application has been before two homes and our references accepted but they say they have none of the age we wish. We want a little girl, between the age of six months and three years. Eyesight and hearing must be good but do not care about nationality, only she must be white. We want to adopt her, will give her a good home, educate her and love and care for her as our own. There are older girls and boys to be had but our family is all boys and we want a girl to bring up as a daughter. Among all our Comfort family I hope there may be some one who knows of a little one needing a mother's love and care and a home as much as I want her.

The Call of His Country

HE was an American girl of a pretty brunette type, but her mother had been English; and when Britain made it known that she needed still more women in the carrying on of her part in the war, this girl felt that her duty lay across the sea. When she calmly took stock of herself and her belongings, she saw no reason why she should stay idly in the little New England town that had been her home all her life, while there seemed to be every reason why she should give her services to her mother's country. She had no near relatives alive, and her possessions were not many.

So Alma Deveridge went to England, learned to be a surgical nurse in a London hospital, and then went to Belgium, as a Red Cross nurse, with a shipload of those good fighting men whom the Regulars and Territorials called "Kitchener's Mob."

Mob."

It was in a low, squat building that had been converted into a sort of first-aid hospital, not far back of the trenches. Women ware not commonly sent here, because of the danger; but there had been a shortage of capable nurses, and Alma had asked to go, and they had finally consented. At the first, her work had sickened her; the sight of an operation had been a horrible sight to her. Then she had taken hold of her feelings, and forced herself to be brave. Now the ranking surgeon of this field hospital often complimented her upon her coolness.

A stalwart figure, supline and literally swathed in bandages, was quietly taken out of the operating room, and placed carefully on a narrow bed in a long row of narrow beds. Doctor Wilbert stood in the doorway, watching the silent figure, and he shook his head. A hand touched his arm. It was Alma.

"Hant he any chance?" she murmured in a long row of narrow beds. Doctor Wilbert stood in the doorway, watching the silent figure, and he shook his head. A hand touched his arm. It was Alma.

"Hasn't he any chance?" she murmured.

The surgeon turned his weary eyes upon her. He had slept none the night before; now it was night again, and still he hadn't slept.

"It looks bad," he told her. "Barbed wire, a plece of shrapnel, and a blow from a rifle's butt. Confidentially, he's a well-educated young Frenchman who got into trouble with his country. He was accused of selling French war secrets to the eneuty, and he had no way of proving himself innocent: therefore he ran away to England, joined 'Kitchener's Mob,' and is now fighting his country's enemies incognito. Yes, I know him well. If he lives, Miss Alma, you must certainly keep all this to yourself. But I'm afraid the poor fellow won't last until morning."

The hospital force, save only wornout Doctor Wilbert, was very busy that night, and Alma volunteered to do an extra turn and had her way. She would have opportunities, she reminded Wilbert, to snatch sleep now and then. Perhaps it was partly because of a sudden sympathetic interest in the unfortunate Frenchman; anyway, she spent a great deal of her time near his bed, both before and after he recovered from the effects of ether. And during all that time she was prodded by the idea that she had seen Jean Dunand before! This, of course, was an assumed name; he couldn't well have gone under his own name, under the circumstances.

After midnight, he looked up with the light of reason in his eyes, and smiled at her. She noted that he was rather good-looking.

"Hello, Miss Deveridge," he muttered, and she immed he he was her!

was the difficulty.
Dunand searched his mind uncensingly for a way out, and he was happy on the day when he decided that he had found it. It was in the autumn, and the trees that had been left by shot and shell wore leaves of dull brown. But he had to have a confidante; he had to have someone who would tell all about it afterward, for he expected to die in the scheme that he had hit upon.

It was but natural for him to go to the girl he loved. Therefore, on one of the days that his company spent at its rest billets, he obtained leave and went to visit the hospital in which Alma Deveridge served as a nurse.

There were a few trees about the building, and to one of these Dunand led the girl, who was off duty for the time being. They sat down on a crude bench, and the Frenchman, after having first won Alma's promise to tell nothing until it was all over, told Alma everything.

"Your plan——it might not work," murmured the girl, when he had finished.

Deep Uncle Charlie:

Jouglas, P. O. Box 780, Ariz.

Dear Uncle Charlie:

I enjoyed your Christmas greeting so much that I must tell you about it. I am a native of Hungary, and was a subject of the Austrian Emperor when I emigrated to America, and I speak the German language, but you could not find any foreign publications in my house. I agree with everything you say about the foreign publications, but what about the foreign schools? Ignorant parents never know what harm they do to their children when they have them taught by foreign teachers. There are foreign colonies in the U. S. which get their teachers from abroad. Do you think these children can make good citizens of the U. S. A. after being under the influence of foreign teachers? I know the feeling of foreigners better than most people, and I know just about how much Americanism is in most of them. I would like to introduce a law that would compel every foreigner who lands here to take out his first papers immediately and the sooner he got his second papers the better. Most of these foreigners come to this country to earn enough money to build up their homes in the old country, that is, they want to use us like a good milk cow just as long as it suits their purpose. What little I know of the American language was picked up from constant reading of Americans. Frank Fueedy.

And the street production of the street personnel after a more of the street personne

SHALL omit the introductory talk which I and prepared for this issue because its had been been the feel important of foreign-born Prank Furedy with the pusilianimous carping of the native Americanism and uttering such unpatriotic sentiments and uttering and uttering such unpatriotic sentiments and uttering such unpatriotic sentiments and uttering and uttering such unpatriotic sentiments and uttering such unpatriot the masses. I doubt you now. I'm no pro-German, I'm no spy. I'm just a working man thirty-three years.

Thank you John, Joe, or Jim, whichever it may be, for your ferocious and highly amusing letter. I regret I could not print all your hymn of hate, as it is too bad to deprive our readers of a good laugh. I'm just as anxious to have a really democratic world in which every human being can have an opportunity to develop the very best that is in him, as you are, Joe. The difference between us is this: I know how to get the world we both want, and you don't. You want to shoot up society and wreek civilization through a reign of terror and anarchy, like the I. W. W. are attempting here and the Bolsheviki have done in Russia. I want to use the ballot and not the bullet. Like all of those who have been fooled by the Kaiserized radical press, and in spite of the fact that you say you are not pro-German, you are working for Germany and you are doing your level best, consciously or unconsciously, to compass the death at the hands of Germany of those two nephews of yours who wear the uniform of the U. S. A., and also you are doing your level best to enslave the masses of Germany, and the masses, too, including the Socialists, of France, Italy and England, and aiding, too, in the subjugation of your own native land by the bloodthirsty Hun, and the destruction of that socialism of which you profess to think so much of, but which in your hands is nothing but the most rabid and narrow class hatred. The biggest half of the working class in Germany is hypnotized by the Kaiser. They worship him and are ready to conquer the world and murder humanity when he gives the word—and he has given it. If you are waiting for a revolution in Germany you will wait for a million years. When Germany is deferted in the field and she finds the Hohenzollerns are not the invincible conquerors she thought they were then there may be a revolution. A few German soldiers with machine guns can soon settle any half baked revolution that is started in G

Often more depends on her and her care and judgment in bringing our boys back to health than upon the doctors themselves. They must have women who have been through the hard grind of three years in our big hospitals, women who can attend operations, sterilized and germless, and who know every organ of the body and how it functions, and every symptom of disease and how it should be treated; women who know all about drugs and how they should be administered and the effects they will have. All the girls in the United States want to become nurses or movie actresses. The former ambition does credit to their hearts but not to their heads. To be anything worth while in this world one must train and study. All of you, of course, would expect your twenty-five dollars a week and all you could give in return would be to stand by a sick bed and say: "Poor dear, let me kiss him for his mother." Now go to your nearest hospital, where they will probably have a training school, go through three years of hard work and denial and let the home folks supply you with the few dollars you will need to keep you in shoe leather during your training. The cost of drugs and running a hospital is enormous, so that few hospitals could afford to pay more. Probably, under the stress of war training, pay will be in creased and the three years cut down to two and a half, but physicians don't want to lower the high standard of the nursing profession, and it should not be lowered. People always want something for nothing, but it can't be got in the nursing or any other profession. You can begin training at eighteen years of age at most hospitals.

BRANTWOOD, WIS

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:
I send you my little poem on the New Year:

The New Year now is here, the brightest day of all the year.

With bright smiling faces the morning was so bright, And the evening was light for the moon was shining all through the night,

The New Year's bells rang out the song, and the children played around the hall,

The New Year's gifts were all so gay, which the New Year brought along on Happy New Year's Day, Your niece, FANNY AHO.

Fanny, I thank you for your New Year poem. Glad to know there was one bright spot in the U. S. on New Year's day. Probably this hilarity was due to the fact that the Kaiser's friends, Messrs. Berger and La Follette have but few folowers and sympathizers in your neighborhood. Just how doleful it was in this vicinity and the rest of the U. S. A. is set forth in my rhyme.

oh, New Year's Day, oh, New Year's Day,
The poets have sung that you're O. K.
And Fanny Aho of Brantwood, Wis.,
Thinks you're a peach in the New Year's biz.
But with all the earth in a blanket of snow,
And brother in France a-chasing the Hun,
And brother in France a-chasing the Hun,
And coal three hundred dollars a ton.
Oh, New Year's Day some kid you may be,
But you can't make a hit with the likes of me.
For Sis has pneumony and l'op has the grip
And Grandma's mose is froze at the tip.
And the cat and the dog have their tails frost bit,
And the hired man's crawled in the stove and quit.
And the cold has frozen the rooster so,
His neck must be thawed before he can crow.
When it's Fourth of July and we've prickly heat,
New Year's songs perhaps may sound sweet.
But with coal and wood at its present high price—gee,
Dom't hand out this New Year's dope to me.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

You are certainly very patriotic, and in regard to the Kaiser I hate him just as bad as you do. Some of the women folks here have organized a Red Cross-Society, and meet every Thursday at a large hall and make clothing for the soldiers. My mother is greatly interested in the Red Cross work, but why shouldn't she be? She has eight sons and all but two large and old enough to serve their country. I think now our country is in the war we should think of what we can do to help her win it instead of our own pleasures. This summer I am going to stay close at home and try and help Uncle Sam, who has been so good to us. Father always says, "As you plant a tree, so it will grow." If people are jaught to save when they are young and small Uncle Sam wouldn't have to tell them to save, and Mr. Hoover wouldn't have such a task. Uncle Charlie I wish I could hand you a slice of our war bread. It is half flour and half outmeal. Now maybe you think it isn't good! I will close hoping to see my letter in print. Your loving niece, DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

pulling together have acted independently and without concerted action; and thanks to Russian treason and Bolshevik depravity; and thanks to Germany's ability to overwhelm small nations, she has the best of the deal at present, and the subjects of a victorious monarch seldom if ever dethrone him, for nothing succeeds like success, no matter how dearly that success is bought. Our enemy is powerful and utterly reckless and merciless, for the Kaiser knows if he loses this war he and his aristocratic loafers will go forever and the people will rule, and they would rather plunge the world into hell than lose their soft jobs of exploiting the masses. I am glad you are living a Christian life for it is the only life. You can plan all the social improvements you like, plan for heaven on earth, but if Germany wins this war all Christian effort will be unavailing. Christians must work and fight and, if need be, die in this war for the preservation of Christian ideals.

Caring for the Youngsters

HE coming year's success depends largely on the number of chicks which can be carried through from hatching time to the eighth week in vigorous health. It is the chick that grows in frame and vitality during these first weeks that makes the heavy layer and the plump table bird later in life. It is estimated that not seventy-five per cent of the chickens hatched on the general farm live to be four weeks old, even when hens are being used to do the incubating and brooding, and not more than fifty per cent when incubators and brooders are being used, and it is due solely to the want of knowledge on the part of the person who has them in charge. Given a hundred chicks from ergs laid by healthy birds and hatched in an incubator which has been properly operated, the losses should not exceed five per cent.

operated, the losses should not exceed five per cent.

It must be understood that the first two weeks are the really critical time in a chick's life. If they get stunted or upset during that time, no amount of care afterwards can counteract the damage done to their constitutions. Of course, the first consideration in caring for incubator chickens is the brooder. The continuous house, heated by hot water pipes and divided into small runs with a hover in each, is the one employed by large poultry plants, and is undoubtedly the best, but such a brooder house is expensive to erect, and not practical for a small poultry keeper. Next comes the outdoor colony brooder with two compartments, in one of which is a hover heated by a lamp. The outer, or exercise compartment, is warned only by the air from the hover compartment, and so of course is much cooler than the hover compartment, the coldest weather. Such brooders are complete in themselves, being thoroughly storm proof, and can be placed in any convenient sheltered place. They cost from nine to fifteen dollars.

Next in order comes what is

The special strip descrees, which is the right temperature for little chicks to play in. Keep the floor four or five theires with weighting from the hay mow, or finely chopped from the hay may have a state of the hay mow, or finely chopped from the hay may have a state of the hay mow, or finely chopped from the hay may have a state of the hay have a state of the hay have a state of the hay have a st first two weeks of life as a chicken, and for this reason chicks require an abundance of easily digested, mutritious food, and to keep the digestive system in proper working order, it must be supplied in small quantities very frequently.

After the fourth day, never leave mash before them more than fifteen minutes at a time, and don't make more than is needed for one day at a time, or it may sour and cause trouble; besides which, if it is left before them all the time, they will have no inducement to scratch and hunt for the chick feed.

From the fourth to the eighth week, we keep a dry mash before them all the time in self-feeding hoppers, for they will not eat this as greedily as they do the soft mash. Give them all the fresh green stuff they will eat at noon. Young alfalfa and clover leaves are good. If you have neither, use the green sprouts of oats.

The dry mash is the same as that used at the New Jersey Experiment station, and is composed of the following grains:

Wheat bran, 50 pounds; gluten feed, 10 pounds; corn meal, 10 pounds; ground oats, 10 pounds; meat scraps, 10 pounds; dry ground bong, 10 pounds.

The Great Value of Skim Milk

I wish to call special attention to the value of sour skim milk in baby chick feeding. Sour milk is very palatable; it also contains much food value in its casein, which is a form of protein or nitrogen. The greatest benefit, however, lies in its disinfecting qualities. The lactic acid present kills and prevents the multiplication of intestinal bacteria. White diarrhea is one of the most dangerous of these forms. In order to get the greatest benefit from sour skim milk it should be given the youngsters from the very first day, being given in a closed vacuum fountain, so that the chicks cannot get their feathers soiled with it. It should be changed daily and the vessel kept perfectly clean. Experiments conducted at the Connecticut Experiment Station have proven its great value. Experiments conducted at the New Jersey Station show that where sour milk is used as mentioned, the percentage of mortality was very materially reduced over pens that did not receive it. Also the skim milk chicks made a gain in weight of over 28 per cent more than those receiving no milk. Since these conclusive tests, it is needless to say that we are feeding skim milk (sour) to all of our young chicks during the brooding period with the greatest success.

He few commence noulk, like the water that is given to chickens, must be in dishes that are partly covered to prevent them getting into it. For the sour milk, we use small fruit saucers, with a strip of board put across the top, so did to the dish. At the end of half an hour, the milk is taken away, and two hours later they have their first real food, which consists of stale hread witch has been diried in the cup of this is mixed with two eggs which have been holied hard, coled, and chopped, shell and all. ground, then have it plowed and seeded to rye, oats, if you move brood coops to fresh ground, and keep the chicks away from the old runs till they are three vigorously and so dislodge and eject the intruder from the windpipe before it has had opportunity to weaken the bird or affect its health.

Respectfully yours, ELIZABETH WAINWEIGHT.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I am a newcomer in your happy corner but an old reader. I have taken this paper since I was a young girl and I used to get subscribers.

I have come for advice. I was married when I was sixteen years old to a man of twenty-eight and he was almost a stranger to me. He came to visit his uncle, a neighbor of ours, and I met him in January and married him in March. I came away out here among strangers three hundred and seventy-five miles from home. We have been married nine years and I have been back home three times during that time on two weeks' visits. This coming summer we are going again but I want to stay three or four weeks instead of the usual two. There has always been a jangle and quarrel every time this has been mentioned and I have always given in to him. Now he says he will send me and stay home himself but I know he needs the vacation. What would the sisters do? Take him at his word and go, or would that be very selfish of me? I am so homesick and I don't enjoy the two weeks. All I do is wash and dress the children (we have three, and the oldest is seven), pack and unpack the suitcase and rush from one house to another. He goes to see only his uncle as he doesn't care much for or doesn't know any of my aunts and uncles very well. I want him to let me go out two weeks before he does and then he could come and get me but he won't do that. Now that is where I think he is selfash for he is cross now or he wouldn't offer to send me. He is afraid to let me go for fear I won't come back. I don't want to seem selfish but I do want to go. He always spoils my visits for I am always afraid I will do something or say something that will make him grouchy, and I don't want any of my folks to know how things are.

I am twenty-five years old, with brown curly hair and blue eyes and a light complexion.

I hope to get the opinion of the sisters.

Perplexed.—That's a very appropriate nom de plume and I suppose I could say it serves you right for marrying when you were so young and on such short acquaintance but I won't do that. Instead, I'll publish your letter and let the sisters help you.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

From my window the world looks dreary all snow covered, and it seems that the sun has refused to shine. I know that some of us have caught the gloom of just such a day and I wonder, has every day a sorrow, every heart a care? Surely, life is what we make it. We should never borrow trouble and, above all, lend it to another but on life's rough sea each day and hour, with loving deeds of mercy, unlock doors to peace and quiet, love tranquil and serene. Then what a good world it would be. We should cultivate a Christian-like pity, now almost dormant for the young life that has been broken by sin. The life thus saved might save another from the same snare. If we would oftener breathe the breath of forgiveness and thank God that he has placed in us a heart that can freely forgive, then would most of our petty troubles take wing, leaving no sorrow to cause a sigh, but meekly we would bear our measure.

measure.

Here my thoughts wander back to the many good letters I have read in Composer, though I am simply disgusted with the John subject. Do you know that if my husband were ever so bad it would be far below my dignity to burden the good readers with his faults. Did not I alone choose him for better or for faults. Did not I alone choose him for better or for worse?

I am a lover of life's school and of Nature and have derived much pleasure from both.

Some may fall to become acquainted with me in reading this rambling missive though that has been my unhappy lot—never understood.

If this finds space you may hear from me again, when the wild rose is spied, in all its youthful pride. Remember me as Busy Little Mother.

BRADLEYVILLE, MO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Will you please make room for a stranger to you although you do not seem as strangers to me.

I am twenty-one years old and have been married a year and a half to a good husband. My dear mother died when I was six years old and I was among strangers from that time until I was married, and it wasn't all pleasant either but now I am happy. If the sisters want to make some one happy I will tell them how to do it and at a cost of three cents. My father was minety-one years old the 22nd of March and while this is too late for cards for his birthday I would like for as many as care to, to send him cards. He is spry for his age and husked eighty shocks of corn last fall and put up the fodder just as good as if he were thirty years old instead of ninety, only it took him a little longer. He is healthy and gets around wonderfully. So if you want him to be happy, send him a card and put the name of your lown and state on it, also, of course, your own name. He will look the cards over and over. His address is Isaac Culp, Laurelville, Ohlo.

Now for a few helps. When hot weather comes and your husband's shirts get soiled quickly, have him change them oftener and put the dirty ones to soak, first rubbing a good naphtha soap on them. Let them soak over night and in the morning wash them out, using a stiff brush on the more soiled parts of cuffs and collar.

· Something About Oil

OU have heard about "greasing the road to prosperity." Now let me tell you a few things about greasing "the road to beauty."

Most of us hayen't enough oil in our systems. Our skin wrinkles or shows tired lines easily, and that is because it is dry, not soft and pliable. Using cold cream as a daily ungent helps to ward off the wrinkles, but we should also seek to supply the necessary oil to the system, for the sake of our health as well as of our good looks.

A tablespoonful of olive oil taken internally, three times a day, will help immensely, and have, besides, a very beneficial effect on the eliminative functions, making the use of cathartics an infrequent necessity. This is, as well, an excellent way to gain flesh, because of course it is itself almost pure fat, and is taken into the system as fat.

BURNISHING THE FINGER-NAILS.

I have already advised you as to using oil for a dandruff shampoo, and I hope you are all following my advice, but I wonder how many of you have ever thought of using a drop of oil—yes, literally, just a drop—to give your fingernails a soft polish after manicuring. Put a drop in the palm of one hand, and doubling the fingers of the other hand, rub the nails back and forth on the oiled palm. Or apply the oil directly to the nails with a finger-tip, and use a pad of tissue paper to do the polishing.

When you are very, very tired indeed, and have been on your feet practically all day, try rubbing a little warm oil into the soles of your feet, gently massaging them. This not only soothes the feet, but relaxes nerve tension and has a most desirable restorative effect.

Another excellent way of using olive oil for relaxing purposes is to mix thoroughly one half cup of olive oil and one tablespoonful of lavender water, rubbing them into the entire skin of the body immediately after drying the skin following a hot bath. The hot skin will absorb the oil speedily, and there will be no greasiness left, but only a soft warm skin. Be sure your bath is hot, else the skin will be comparatively cool, and greasiness will result.

A bit of olive oil—or of sesame oil—can be used to the advantage of the eyebrows. If you have an eyebrow brush—something like a baby's toothbrush—drop the oil on it and brush the brows gently, also touching the edge of the eyelids, although the finger-tip is better for making the application of the oil to the eyelids than the brush.

So get out your olive oil bottle, members of the Pretty Girls' Club, and see what wonders it can perform for you!

I have a boy four years old and a little girl not quite a year old.

Mrs. V. M., try just as hard as you can to love your husband and perhaps in time love will come to you. I have heard that it would. Also you might make that trip of which you spoke. Absence makes the heart grow fonder, you know. Let us hear from you again.

at the back of each leg. This will hold your corset and prevent any sliding up. With garters properly fastened, you may now the your corsets. The first across the small of the back, drawing the strings firmly, knotting, and tucking knots and ends under the corset. Now draw up the strings at waistline, and the again. Never let the top of the corset be pulled together—there should be looseness there, but the waist should be firm and all below the waist firm. When you are ready to undress, untle the corset in the back, both places, and loosen laces before unhooking front or garters. Do this each time you put on or take off a corset and you will find those "large hips too low down" a thing of the past, I am sure. In the meantime, as an extra precaution, it would not be a bad idea for you to practice the various abdominal exercises I have given in Comfort recently. Now about the fuzz on your cheek. I should not use electrolysis for this. As a matter of fact, we all attach too much importance to "fuzz" on our own cheeks. If you want to know whether that is true or not, stop to realize how little you notice fuzz on anybody else. Start right in noticing your friends, for a week, and you will find nine out of ten have exactly the same condition, yet you have never realized it. Poets even talk about the "lovely peach down" on a woman's cheeks. However, if that doesn't console you, don't use electrolysis anyway, because where there is as close a growth as down, you are sure to stimulate other hair roots while you take out some, and soon you would be apt to have a real growth, not a down. Why not bleach the growth with peroxide, and try to kill it with ammonia? It is a long process, but the bleaching begins almost at once. Now about the toenalis, which are brittle and thick. Toenalis are often rendered thick by too short toes, which press upon the nalls and retard their growth so they grow thick instead of long. Your shoes should be a size and a half longer than the measurement of the foot. All fashlonable shoe stores if t

Try this, and let me know again, after a month, how your nails are coming on.

ELSIE.—The reason your head aches after reading or sewing may be from your eyes, or it may be from the fact that you are not strong, and indeed the weakness of your eyes may come from that, too. The thing for you to do is to build yourself up. You ought to weigh over a hundred pounds instead of only fifty! So let's see what to do. Are you where you can get lots of milk to drink? If you can drink it—a couple of quarts a day. But I have a suspicion that you can't get milk in such quantities, so if you can't we must use something else, mustn't we? You can get potatoes, I am sure, so eat plenty of those, but never fried potatoes. Yours should be baked or boiled, and eaten the moment they are done. And you should eat lots of oatmeal, and rice and other ecreals, with cream and sugar if you can get plenty of cream. Nothing is quite so good to make you fat and well. And you should eat lots of bread and butter, and fruits and vegetables. For breakfast, eat some fruit, a baked apple or some stewed prunes, or an orange, or a baked

PHILADELPHIA. MISS.

DEAR SISTERS:

I wish to tell sufferers from asthma how I found relief from that disease. I suffered for seven or eight years and at times would almost die. Two years ago I had a very bad attack and I began taking castor oil. At first I took nearly a bottleful a day but decreased the amount as I grew better. I seldom have an attack now but when I do I take castor oil. I believe it saved my life and I want every sufferer to know of this remedy.

Long live Comport,

MES. EMMA HARDY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

May I join your happy circle for a little chat? I am five feet, three inches tall, weigh one hundred and fifty-five pounds and am twenty-two years old. I have dark brown hair and eyes and wear glasses. I am housekeeper for a widower with two children, a boy of eight and a girl of six. They go to school. I have been here two years and like very much. Before I came here I cooked in a hotel in the Feather River canyon. I was there a little over two years. I have been working ever since I was thirteen years.

old. I had to leave school and begin work then so I could help my widowed mother and baby sister. I am sending a little sketch on how to preserve a husband that I copied from another paper.

I will close with love to the sisters.

How to Preserve a Husband

"Be careful in your selection. Do not choose too young. When once selected, give your entire thoughts to preparation for domestic use. Some insist upon keeping them in a pickle, others are constantly getting them into hot water. This may make them sour, hard and sometimes bitter; even poor varieties may be made sweet, tender and good by garnishing them with patience, well sweetened with love and seasoned with kisses. Wrap them in a mantle of charity. Keep warm with steady fire of domestic devotion and serve with peaches and cream. Thus prepared they will keep for years."

with peaches and cream. Thus prepared they will keep for years."

Dear Editor and Sisters:

I always felt interested in the Sisters Corner and thought I should write "sometime" (which is no time—as you know—) and air my views on several of the interesting subjects under discussion but never felt impelled to write until now.

In the October number I read a letter which was right in my "line of business"—for I intend within a few months to become a student in an evangelist training school—therefore my business is "my Father's business." The letter which impels my writing is that of our sister Mrs. Dolly I. Hull, whom I believe to be a person of sterling character, "abounding in good works."

I know this corner is no place to discuss religious doctrines, but do all of you know the difference in the meanings of the words doctrine and creaf! Truly, this is not the place to discuss different doctrines, but do you know that the dear Mrs. Johnson who wrote us that lovely letter some time ago, describing her little ones' Christmas (and by some statements therein letting us know she was a Roman Catholic), and the dear Etta Baker whose letter published recently in Comport informs us she is a Baptist S. S. teacher,—do you know they both believe the same creed, word for word, that is, the Apostles' Creed? Yes, Dolly I. Hull, the Bible is centuries old, and the civilization you enjoy today is the result of the laws spoken by our Creator amid thunderings and lightnings on Mount Sinal, given centuries ago to the Israelites, His "peculiar people." If you do not believe this, compare Blackstone with the Mosaic law; you will find them essentially the same (although perhaps at rare intervals you may find a law which is a trifle modified by some Caesaric thought).

The Bible is the Word of God,—from the first of Genesis to the end of Revelation. It is in no place "vulgar" (by which word I presume you mean the stronger word obscene, you may be very sure it would be found upon the persons of criminals and in the brothels,—places wher will not suffer us to be tempted above that we are able.

The title of the poem you sent in is very true—"Not Much of a Creed"—and that is what the lost, Satanblinded soul therein depicted would learn when it was too late, for as St. Paul says.—"We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ." (Romans 14:10)
Yet all sincere Christians do righteously; their noble deeds and wouderful sacrifices would so far outshine those of the poor Christless man of that poem that his good deeds in comparison with theirs would be as sand-grains beside mountains for good works follow salvation as the "fruits of salvation." Still we are "saved by grace through faith" and in nowise by character through works. Scripture says that all our righteousness is as "filthy rags" therefore we cannot be self-saved but must be Christ-saved.

"I wish I'd died for him," she said, with a strange involuntary turning to the man who a moment ago had judged her. And Houghton believed her.

In the silence he shivered, for the chill of death, as well as morning, was in the great room. He had had a hard night's work and no sleep, but he could not go and leave Lady Levallion. Any chance comer might hear her say something senseless, might retail it at the inquest.

"Why did you bring him here?" she cried suddenly. "This awful room—he was alive here only a little while ago."

"It seemed best." The man could not say that one reason was lest he should disturb her by taking Levallion to his own room, so that she came in and saw him before he was made ready for his coffin; the other, that here the jury would more easily view the body. He thanked God she had not got here before he carried Levallion back from that bare table in the justice-room, that she had no thought of what had been done there.

for his coffin; the other, that here the jury would more easily view the body. He thanked God she had not got here before he carried Levallion back from that bare table in the justice-room, that she had no thought of what had been done there.

"You must come with me," he said, and for the first time she looked at him.

"You care!" she said sharply. "Oh, I thought there was no one who cared but me—and Tommy! And I never cared till tonight. God knows I'd sell my soul to have him back—even to know what he would like me to do."

"Tell the truth!" said Houghton involuntarily, and saw freezing terror in her eyes for the second time that night.

Her answer was absent, curious.

"I've nothing to tell. In my inmost soul I believe, I will believe, I've nothing to tell. Oh, if I'd only made you happy, perhaps—"

"Look at his face," said Houghton simply.

But she barely heard him.

Once more she drew to her breast—now that it was too late for the man who had longed for her love to feel it—the face she had never held there in life. With anguish she kissed the shut eyes—for there are two kinds of love in a woman's heart, and if she had given one utterly to Adrian Gordon, it was the other, that is best and highest, that was Levallion's now. If she cared this hour whether Adrian Gordon lived or died it was not for his own sake so much as "Good by," she whispered. "I'll never see you again. You were too good for a little fool like"

Levallion's. "Good by," she whispered. "I'll never see you again. You were too good for a little fool like me. And if I've brought you here, I'll pay for it." She took no more heed of Houghton than if he had been a stick or a stone, as she let him follow her to where Celeste waited in the hall. But though Doctor Houghton went to bed, the thoughts in his mind kept the sleep he needed away.

CHAPTER XXVI.

TRIFLES LIGHT AS AIR.

CHAPTER XXVI.

TRIFLES LIGHT AS AIR.

"The last jury on earth he would have wanted!"

Doctor Houghton looked at the country neighbors whom the very irony of fate had assuredly brought together as jurors at the inquest on the death of Lord Levallion. He had systematically neglected or despised them all, and there was not a man among them who really wondered at the tragic ending of a man who had been so notoriously unpopular. Since not one of them owed either benefit or injury to Levallion they should give a strictly impartial verdict, Houghton thought, as he was sworn; yet it struck a curious anger in him when, as they viewed the body, not one of them had said "poor Lady Levallion;" and he realized that the whole county thought her a victim to a loveless marriage.

He was apparently the first witness; and, stripped of its technicalities, the gist of his evidence was that the late Lord Levallion had certainly been poisoned with some form of prussic acid in the liqueur he drank. The post-morten left no doubt of anything but the precise form in which the poison had been administered. "Some one, any one, might have been in his dressing-room, during the evening," he finished slowly. "I found this in the door, caught in the lock," producing his little rag of tweed, "but I am afraid it is no clue; for the stuff is familiar to me, and was very likely a suit of Levallion's own, which he might have worn that afternoon. Any thought of suicide is out of the question!" sharply, as a juror murmured something. "Lord Levallion was the last man to do such a thing. He was a man of very superior intellect, and was, of late, supremely happy."

He did not notice that a girl was sitting in a dark corner behind him as he stepped down from the witness-stand, and stood where the face of each fresh witness would be clearly seen. For the servants were called in, and one by one dismissed as useless.

All of them had been sitting in the servants' hall, when Sir Thomas Annesley's dog had come through there as if it were mad, and run all roun the meeting, yet she gracefully returned his salutation.

"I am surprised to find you ladies in this vicinity. I presume, however, that you are 'upon deeds of mercy intent,' since nothing else could have tempted you hither," the duke replied, as he assisted Miss Therwin to her seat and covered her with the robe.

"If we were only in America, I should call you a Yankee for your shrewdness. I suppose, out of politeness, we shall be obliged to impute the same intention to you, since it is vain to suppose that Algeria street can have any more attractions for you than for us," laughed Miss Therwin, brightly, and giving him at the same tinse a wicked look, which Sibyl did not see.

"I should say that there was considerable attraction in Algeria street just at this moment," he replied, gallantly, "but I only came this way to cut off a considerable distance on my way to the clubrooms in Maxwell street."

"Maxwell street? Ah! we shall pass that way, my lord; have a seat with us and bear us company,"—saying which Miss Therwin removed her reticule from the opposite cushions to make room

"If I shall not intrude, it would give me pleasure," he returned, with a quick glance at Sibyl; but she was busied with the fastening of her glove and did not perceive it, consequently was spared the necessity of a reply.

"Certainly you will not intrude, and there is an abundance of room, as you will perceive," answered Ada, and while his lordship was arranging the robes comfortably about him, she gave some directions to the footman in a low tone, and in another moment they were flying with the swiftness of the wind over the smoothly trodden snow.

trodden snow.

The duke was master of the art of making him-The duke was master of the art of making himself agreeable, and, although Sibyl was somewhat quiet and reticent at first, it was not long before he had broken the spell, and both he and Miss Therwin grew exultant, as her clear laugh rang out sweet as a silver bell on the pure air. So animated and entertaining did he make himself, that she forgot that they were to leave him at Maxwell street, and she was not aware how time was slipping by, nor where they were going, until she had found they were about to cross the bridge in Maxwelltown, and heard the clock on a neighboring tower strike "one."

him at Maxwell street, and she was not aware how time was slipping by, nor where they were going, until she had found they were about to cross the bridge in Maxwelltown, and heard the clock on a neighboring tower strike "one."

"Why, Ada!" she cried, with a startled look, "where are you going?"

"Only for a little ride, dear," was the quiet response, as if she were innocent of any stratagem in the matter.

"But I ought to have returned immediately."

"Ought? Is not your time your own?" Miss Therwin asked, with half a sneer.

"I suppose I may do as I like, but I should have preferred to return directly." Sibyl answered, quietly, but in a way that told both her companions that it would not be safe to assume too much in their dealings with her.

"The day was so fine and the slelghing so good that I could not resist the temptation to extend our trip a little. I knew that the duke did not care particularly about his club, and I supposed you were entirely at liberty. I am sorry, however, if I have interfered with any previous arrangement," Ada replied, with every aptearance of regret, and Sibyl never mistrusted "at both the ride and the meeting with the Duc d'Aubigne had been planned the night previous in order to throw him into her society.

Miss Therwin had agreed to assist him to become more intimately acquainted with the fair girl—had, in fact, pledged herself to help him win her, that she might have the field clear to win Raymond Prescott for herself. She had told him of their proposed visit to the "poor woman," and planned that he should accost them as they were about leaving the place, and ride with them. It had been their intention to go over to Maxweltown, and stop for a lunch there, and return. It had been their lintention to go over to Maxweltown, and stop for a lunch there and return. The dear manner was so decided, though she said, with a sunle, in reply to Ada's regrets: "I am afraid that it will interfere with a not very-well-learned German lesson which I have to recite at two," that Ada dared not pers

A week passed, and Sibyl visited Mrs. Stillman every day.

The woman appeared to be worse after a day or two, and was confined to her bed, and, out of her deep sympathy for her, Sibyl often stayed with her much longer than she ought or intended. She strove to persuade her to allow her to procure a nurse to take care of her, but this the woman gently, though firmly, refused.

She preferred, she said, not to have a stranger around her. She was often so sorrowful and unhappy that she did not wish any one to witness her grief, and all the young girl's entreaties were of no avail in that direction.

She desired also to bring Sir Athelstone to prescribe for her, but this proposition appeared to startle and excite her so much that Sibyl did not mention it a second time.

She had not spoken of her children again after that first visit, and seemed disinclined to talk hunch about herself but she was very grateful for the kindness and attention which Sibyl bestowed upon her, while the young girl became more and more interested in her every day.

Often when she was reading, Sibyl would glance up to find the work and there were sixed upon her with Cyanide of potassium is a poison that kills like a stroke of lightning, the instant it touches the tongue. These women soldiers carry it for the purpose of committing suicide quickly, as a last desperate means to prevent being captured alive, if wounded or otherwise overpowered in battle and likely to fall into the hands of the enemy. To these brave and virtuous women death is infinitely preferable to the outrages customarily committed by German officers and soldiers on female captives. from Belgium, northern France and other conquered territory and herding them in so-called

This regiment of Russian women is rightly named the "Legion of Death," for with them it is victory or death—in battle or by suicide.

They never surrender, never are taken alive.

It was not because Russia was running short of men—Russia had more men than she could arm and equip—that these heroic women volunteered for military service. Russia's immense army was becoming demoralized through German intrigue and bribery, aided by the seditious propaganda of Russian Socialists and traitors. A muthous spirit pervaded the ranks, desertions were common and frequent, entire divisions refused to tight or deserted in battle, leaving their loyal comrades to be mercilessly cut down or routed by the enemy. It was for the sublime purpose of restoring the morale of the army and awakening in the men a sense of honor and patriotism that these devoted women, many of them ladies of weath, culture, and even of noble birth, left their comfortable homes to train and fight as soldiers.

Very deliberately now the words came; very calmly, at least to all outward appearance, the young girl spoke, but the anguished eyes had become like glowing coals of fire.

"No, no, I never saw her after the first shock!" the woman answered, in wondering, awe struck tones. "I think I'll borrow Furry Otter's blue beads that Santa Claus gave her," went on Minnie, not heeding Cubby Bear's question. "She will be willing, for she told me she should not go. Then I have my new spring hat, trimmed with pussy willows, and a beautiful fan made from wing feathers, which Edric Eagle gave to my grandmother long ago."

They were talking of the frog concert which was given every spring at the edge of Concert Creek, down by the river. It was a long way to go, but many of the little forest people were invited this year, and Shinyblack Crow, who knew the way quite well, was going with them. Shinyblack Crow had brought the invitations from Gruffy Grump, the manager. Froggie Franz was to be the chief singer.

"I cannot go," said Bunny Rabbit sadly. "We would be out very late, and my Baby Bunnies would get too tired. They would be cross next day, and perhaps sick. I must stay at home with them."

"Bring them to me, and I will take care of them." offered Mamma Bruin kindly. "I have day, and perhaps sick. I must stay at home with them."

"Bring them to me, and I will take care of them," offered Mamma Bruin kindly. "I have been to Froggie Franz's concerts before, and do not care to go this time."

They started early, Cubby Bear, Bunny Rabbit, Betty Badger, Minnie Mink, Chirpy Chipmunk, Wollie Woodchuck, Squilly Porcupine, Racky Coon, and Tillie Turtle, all dressed in their best, and all eager and happy. Shinyblack Crow and Billy Bluejay flew above them, but Brownie Whippoorwill, who was shy about being seen in daylight, was coming after dark.

"I can fly quickly," said Brownie, "and will be there in time to hear part of the concert. I will come home with the rest of you."

"I feel so mortified," whispered Bunny Rabbit to Cubby Bear, as they walked along. "I was curling my whiskers, but got the iron too hot, and burned some of them off. Does it show very badly?"

"When look yory nice on the gight side," said.

and burned some of them on. Does it show very badly?"

"They look very nice on the right side," said Cubby, "and you can hold your handkerchief up to the left side when anyone is looking at you. They will soon grow again," he added comfortingly.

After going for some distance, they missed Tillie Turtle.

"Where can she be?" asked Minnie Mink.

"Oh, she is so slow!" said Betty Badger.
"Perhaps when we are on our way home, we shall meet her, still coming!"

They all laughed, but Cubby Bear said, "If we all had to carry our houses on our backs, we might be as slow as Tillie. It is too bad for us to leave her. I will go back and find her."

"No, Cubby Bear! If you do, you will hear no concert tonight! Come with us," urged Squilly Porcupine.

But Cubby Bear went back, and found poor Fillie, creeping slowly along.
"I ought to have started earlier," she said.
"You must not wait for me, Cubby Bear, but it was good of you to come back."
"I can carry you quite easily," said Cubby.
"Now cling tight, and do not fall. We shall soon overtake the rest."

In the creek, many large pads of the yellow lily were growing, and on these the frogs gathered, to give their concert—dozens of frogs, all dressed in their green suits, with white vests. Froggie Franz stood apart from the rest, having a whole lily pad to himself, and seemed not to notice the others at all, looking high above their This is our delight! This is our delight!

Happy are we, singing Gr-ump-te ump, when a stone, thrown from a high bank across the creek, splashed into the water.

Every frog disappeared under the lily pads, and the audience scampered away from the bank as the water splashed around them.

"Whoo—whoo—whoo dared do such a thing?" demanded Mr. Wise Owl in his sternest voice.

"It was Foxy Reynard!" cried Robbie Reddie, who had flown quickly over.

"Oh, shame on him!"

Then Robbie, usually so gentle, gave Foxy a sharp peck on the nose, which was so unexpected that Foxy, standing near the edge of the bank, lost his balance and fell with a big, big splash, into the waters of the creek.

He swam away as fast as he could, confused and ashamed. Trying to spoil the concert had not been the fun he expected.

"He will not be back tonight," said Mr. Wise Owl. "It will be quite safe to go on with the concert."

So the audience settled themselves once more.

So the audience settled themselves once more, and the frogs, one by one, hopped up on the llly pads, their evening suits and white vests looking all the fresher for the wetting they had had. "As our song was interrupted, we will commence it again," announced Gruffy Grump. "But I am sorry to say that Froggie Franz has had such a fright, he will not try to sing again, and has gone home to bed. I will do my best to take his place."

Everyone cheered, and Gruffy Grump, song the

At the close of the concert, Gruffy Grump said: "Now we have a pleasant surprise for you, through the kindness of our friend Cubby Bear."

Cubby Bear brought a basket from a clump of bushes where he had hidden it. He took off the cover, and there, brown and crisp and delicious and filling the basket to the brim, were some beautiful buns which Mamma Bruin had baked that day!

Cubby Bear passed them around, plenty for everyone there, and two left over to send to Froggie Franz.

So the concert ended with cheers for Cubby Bear, and they all started happily for home, eating their buns on the way.

BUILT THE MERRIMAC.—A noteworthy Virginian was Francis Glasgow, who died recently in his home at Richmond at the age of eighty-six and who for more than sixty years was manager of the Tradegar iron works.

His family was old in Virginia, planters for generations. He did not enlist in the Confederate service, being persuaded that his patriotic duty would be better performed in the maintenance of the works which were the most important sources of the iron supply of the Confederacy. In those works the Merrimac was outfitted, under military control, and, strange to say, the Federal army, though frequently raiding the region, never thoroughly destroyed the plant, and the blast furnaces were operated almost continuously through the war. e war. JUNE COMFORT

Although it is thirteen months since we entered the war by formal declaration, so little of the horrors of the conflict has come home to America that many of our people have not taken the situation with due seriousness until recently. But day by day, now, the stern reality is growing upon them as one privation or sacrifice after another is required of them, and with it they are awaking to a new spirit of determination and devotion.

June COMFORT will help its readers to meet these increasingly trying exactions effectively and perform their duty hopefully, cheerfully and with abiding faith. The following are a few of the Special Features for June

"Home Canning and Drying of Fruits and Vegetables"

The Government has engaged, for the use of the army, half of the entire output of all the canning factories the coming season. Therefore canned goods will be scarce and high priced, and it behooves every family to put up a liberal supply of home-canned foods. June COMFORT will explain various ways of canning and drying.

"Emazella's Prophecy"

A truly charming June romance in which Cupid's choice is guided by the Gipsy's prophetic warning. By Joseph F. Novak.

"Our Flag"

The story of how and where it has been borne on to glory. Also tells the marks of respect with which it should be greeted.

"The Man Who Was Afraid"

A thrilling war story. Some fight for excitement, others for patriotism. A woman's trust and love inspired this timid hero with courage.

"Why Am I So Thin?

Dr. J. W. Campbell tells what is the matter with thin folks and how to gain flesh and strength by right eating of proper food.

IV. No Freight to Pay on Alfalfa Feed.—
If the farmer raises his own alfalfa he has no freight bill to pay, no waiting for a car of feed to come in, no hauling from town, no sacks to buy, no inconvenience, no annoyance about getting feed. He just goes into the haymow and throws it down. In war times, when it is so hard to get cars and so difficult to get feed from a distance, alfalfa solves the feed problem.

How to Succeed with Alfalfa

There are half a dozen things which the farmer must know in order to succeed in growing alfalfa. These are liming, inoculation, tillage, seeding, cutting and winter killing. Knowing how to do all of these, the farmer cannot fail. Not knowing how to do any one of the above properly may stand in the way of success.

may stand in the way of success.

ALFALFA MUST HAVE LIME.—Alfalfa must have lime. If there isn't enough lime in the soil the farmer must put it there. Alfalfa will not grow on a sour soil. This is because the bacteria which are so necessary to a proper growth of alfalfa cannot live in a sour soil. The soil should be tested with litmus paper and if the moist soil turns blue litmus paper red, it is acid and must have lime—two to four tons per acre, depending on the sourness of the soil. For liming, ground lime stone is best. It can be applied with a manure spreader or a lime distributor to the surface of the soil after plowing. It should never be plowed under, but harrowed into the surface of the soil.

How to Inoculate for Alfalfa.—There are never be plowed under, but harrowed into the surface of the soil.

How to Inoculate for Alfalfa.—There are several ways to inoculate the soil for alfalfa, but only one or two will be given here.

The nodules which grow on the roots of alfalfa contain germs, called bacteria, which take the nitrogen from the air and build it into the plant, making the soil rich and increasing at the same time the protein content of the plant. If these germs are not in the soil they must be put there. Putting these germs into the soil is called inoculation. One way is to get soil from an old alfalfa field and sprinkle it lightly over the land—or from a sweet clover patch by the roadside which contains the same kind of germs. The other way is to make a thin mucilage or glue and moisten the seed with it, then sprinkle the seed with inoculated soil which has been previously dried. The glue will stick the soil particles to the seed and a little soil will go a long way. When dry, the soil will be sown with the seed, and each seed, being coated with its own soil particles, will be properly inoculated.

Proper Tillage for Alfalfa-Alfalfa land the seed with the grall willed.

PROPER TILLAGE FOR ALFALFA.—Alfalfa land must be well tilled. It takes good soil to grow alfalfa. A wet soil will not do, nor a poorly drained one, nor a sandy one. The soil must be well worked and all weed seeds sprouted and killed by running over with a fine tooth harrow every few days for a week or two; otherwise the weeds may choke out the alfalfa before it gets a

How and When to Sow Alfalfa.—Alfalfa may be sown early in the spring with a light seeding of oats and barley as a nurse crop, or as late as July without a nurse crop if the ground is properly prepared. From ten to twenty pounds of good seed to the acre is used, depending upon locality, the heavier seeding being advised for the upper Mississippi valley and the northeastern states.

WHEN TO CUT ALFALFA.—Alfalfa must be cut as soon as the little shoots appear at the crown of the plant. This is about the time that the first blossoms are forming. If alfalfa is let stand longer than this, the machine will cut off the growing shoots that form the beginning of the second crop, and retard it very much. In this case but two crops can be cut per season, while if cut at the proper time three or even four crops can be harvested.

Alfalfa should not be cut too late in the fall, never after the first killing frosts come on. It must get a good start before winter sets in, to hold the snow and protect the roots. Late-cut alfalfa is in very great danger of winter killing.

WHY ALFALFA WINTER KILLS.—Late cutting, alfalfa is in very great danger of winter killing.

WHY ALFALFA WINTER KILLS.—Late cutting, as already stated, is a frequent cause of winter killing. So, too, is full pasturing of alfalfa fields. Some varieties of alfalfa stand the winter better than others. Southern grown seed taken into northern states is much more likely to winter kill than are the hardier northern grown varieties. Among these the Grimm, Baltic and Cossack appear to be the best.

Alfalfa—War Bread for Stock

ITH the present high price of feeds and the difficulty in securing them; it is of great importance for the farmer to grow his own feeds if he possibly can. For this purpose there is nothing quite so good as alfalfa. There are several reasons why alfalfa is the best feed to grow.

I. ALFALFA Is A RICH FEED.—Alfalfa is the richest protein feed grown on the farm. One care of good alfalfa yields more protein than three acres of clover or ten acres of timothy. Protein is the feed that makes both milk and meat. Bran is a good feed for cows because it contains much protein. So, too, is oil meal and gluten feed, but alfalfa hay well cured is just as good feed, pound for pound, as bran. Many of our "patent" stock foods are prepared from ground alfalfa as a base. Alfalfa is the richest forage crop grown on the farm and a splendid supplement to corn silage.

II. ALL ANIMALS LIKE ALFALFA.—Alfalfa is good for all animals. Fed to chickens it makes them lay, and to cows it produces milk. It is good for rood sows and is greatly relished by horses, sheep and cattle. In fact, all farm animals like alfalfa and do well on it.

III. ALFALFA A HEAVY YIELDER.—An acre of alfalfa will produce more food than an acre of alfalfa and do well on it.

Questions and Answers About Horses

Beginners in live stock husbandry will find useful information in the following list of questions and answers, and we shall be glad to receive and answer other questions about the horse or other amimals, from time to time.

Q. How many teeth has an adult horse?

A. The male horse has 40 teeth, viz: six incisor or pincher teeth in the upper and lower jaw; three premolar, and three true molar or grinding teeth, above and below, in each jaw, on each side of the mouth, and one canine tooth, or tusk, between the incisors and premolars, above and below, on each side of the mouth, in each jaw. The mare has 36 teeth, the four tusks being absent. jaw. T absent.

absent.

G. What are "wolf" teeth?

A. They are vestiges of anterior premolar teeth which were present in the mouth of the prehistoric horse millions of years ago. These teeth and the anterior premolars came just in front of the first premolars in the upper and lower jaws. Wolf teeth are only found in the upper jaw. They are small, have short roots, are unimportant and never cause disease or weakness of the eyes.

O. Why is horse dentistry necessary?

A. The grinders do not completely cross one another when in action, but grind on a slant, leaving the hard enamel long and sharp next to the cheeks above and tongue below. The resultant sharp points interfere with mastication (chewing), and should be filed down in fall and spring. Milk tooth crowns also should be removed, split or diseased molars removed, and long teeth cut down level when such conditions are found present. The horse does well when his teeth are kept in order. present. The kept in order.

Q. Should a horse have ground feed?
A. Every horse that has sound teeth should grind his own feed, with the exception of bran. Ground feed is "bolted" too fast without sufficient chewing, and causes indigestion.

chewing, and causes indigestion.

O. Is bran mash good for a horse?

A. Hot bran mash is an unnatural and indigestible food for a horse, and soured mash is more dangerous. Mashes suddenly fed tend to cause a derangement of the digestive organs, or dangerous or fatal colic. The practice of feeding hot bran mash on Saturday nights is dying out in well-managed stables. Mash is useful in preparing a horse for an aloes physic ball, and sometimes is relished by a sick horse, but must be allowed in moderation and not too often.

O. How should bran be fed?

Q. How should bran be fed!
A. Mix one ninth part of fresh wheat bran by weight with whole oats for horses and dampen it at feeding time. Dry bran may cause choke. Colts may have one sixth to one half part of bran with whole oats. Idle horses may also have a larger proportion of bran.

Q. Is corn (maize) good feed for horses?
A. Yes; as a part ration where oats can be provided. Feed ear corn at noon in addition to oats and bran, or as the sole noon meal. Shelled corn is eaten too fast. Corn must be absolutely free from mould for horses. Feed as an exclusive ration it is too heating and fattening. It is well balanced by sound alfalfa hay, or part alfalfa, and part mixed cloved hay.

Q. What about silage for horses?
A. Sound corn silage may form a small part of the ration for idle horses and growing colts, but it is too loosening for horses at hard work and has been found injurious to breeding stallions and pregnant mares. Mouldy silage is deadly. Prefer roots to silage for horses. Carrots, parsaips and rutabagas are most suitable.

A Barley suitable feed for horses?

A. Barley and barley hay are the chief feeds for horses in some districts on the Pacific Coast. Horses gradually may be accustomed to such feed.

Given suddenly, indigestion is caused.

Patriotism and Sound Criticism

Extract from Subscriber's Letter

Dear Mr. Gannett:

In compliance with your suggestion, I have sent Congressman Bankhead a petition signed by COMFORT subscribers in this neighborhood who join me in asking him to use his influence in favor of the repeal of the zone-rate law before it takes effect. We want a uniform rate of second-class postage, regardless of distance.

I believe our Government also made a great mistake in raising the letter postage to three cents.

Men engaged in unnecessary industries or employments should be sent to the farms to help produce wheat and other food so much needed to feed our soldiers and our Allies.

If vin are to whip the beastly Germans we must give up every luxury during war.

COMFORT monthly gives the farmers plenty of good reading. What better advice could be given than COMFORT'S editorials? And Uncle Charlie writes on this war just as I would if I had the talent. But I haven't, so I will plant a garden, can fruit and vegetables, raise chickens, eat corn bread and save the flour for our noble boys who are suffering in the trenches and braving the terrible gas.

May God help us to win this war-is my prayer.

Sincerely yours,

E. W. HAMMOND.

P. S. I have been a subscriber to COMFORT over twenty years and I have Uncle Charlie's four books.

pose must weigh from 1400 to 1700 pounds and be sound and all right in limb and wind and will be bought at $200 each with no commissions to dealers or middlemen. Readers of this paper who have such horses to sell should list them with the nearest army veterinarian, or with the disgentric council of defense, or with the emergency or regular county agricultural agent. Only mature horses will be taken, as we understand it, so it will be useless to offer young colts. The horses being taken are blocky, well-developed, sound and docile animals. There also is some demand for cavalry horses, but these, we understand, largely are being bought in California. Light horses for other branches of the service are being sent to the big city markets, consigned to contractors, or picked up by their agents in the country. The demand for army horses, and the fact that horse breeding is apparently becoming unpopular with many farmers, leads us to conclude that before long there will be a veritable horse famine for the best classes of draft horses, and we therefore think it unwise for men to abandon horse breeding. Every informed horseman confidently looks for a big demand for good drafters at the close of the war.

Summer Pigs

Summer Pigs

This year there will be a good market for pigs. The government has attempted to fix the price and this will mean a ready sale. The demand for pork for the use of the army and navy and by all the principal European countries will continue brisk. Hence the farmer should raise an extra summer litter. This can be done by breeding sows again right after they farrow in the spring. These summer pigs will make good gains on pasture and be ready for finishing off for market about Holiday time.

Q. Describe the stomach of a horse.

A. The horse's stomach is small, holding but two to four gallons. Its walls have three layers, viz: inner, mucous: middle, muscular, and outer, serous. There is but one compartment, the left side of which does not secrete digestive juices, while the right side is lined with villous mucous membrane which secretes gastric juice, 100 pounds or more of which is needed daily, and it acts in the presence of hydrochloric acid and pepsin, changing the food to an acid soft-seeplible mass. changing the food to an acid, soft-soaplike mass called chyle.

Q. Where does the water go when a horse drinks?

A. A horse may drink five or more gallons of water at one time when thirsty, and it passes through the stomach and through 75 feet of small intestine, and is collected in the first large intestine or cecum, sometimes called the "water bag," or "second stomach." Theoretically, drinking water always should be given before feeding.

Q. What becomes of hay eaten by the horsef A. Hay is chewed and wetted with saliva in the mouth, passes quickly through the stomach and small intestines, and largely is digested in the cecum and large intestine (colon) by action of bacteria (germs) rather than by digestive inices.

Q. When should a work horse be fed hay?

A. Theoretically, it is best to feed hay after water, and before grain. A little hay may be allowed first thing in the morning, and the balance at night when the horse is working hard. A pound or so of hay should be fed at noon in hot weather, while the horse is cooling off, then give grain feed. grain feed.

Q. How much hay does a horse require?
A. A pound of first-class hay for each 100 pounds of body weight is needed as a day's allowance by a hard worked horse. Many allow a trifle over this amount, and the quantity should also be increased and a six learned. also be increased and grain lessened when the horse is idle.

Of Books You Will Be Delighted To Own!

Any one of these books alone is a veritable treasure house of the newest, most beautiful designs. The seven books combined form a complete library in which you will find any pattern in crocheting and tatting you could possibly ask for. You will fairly revel in the many handsome designs shown. There are edgings, beadings, insertions and laces for every conceivable use. The illustrations are actual photographs of the finished work and show every thread so plainly that they are almost as good to work from as the directions themselves. The directions are adapted for either beginner or expert. They tell stitch by stitch how each pattern is worked, also the quantity and size of material required and the correct sizes of hooks to be used. Following is a description of each book. They are 8 by 10 1-2 inches in size with the exception of Volume I which is 9 1-4 by 12 inches. Flease order by numbers.

Volume 1 Crocheted yokes for combinations, envelopes, nightgowns, corset covers, etc.—fifteen all different, exquisite designs.

Volume 2 Handsome crocheted edgings and chiefs underwear, dresses and a multitude of other uses,—thirty-three different designs.

Volume 3 Eighteen lovely designs in Cluny insertions and laces for centerpieces, library scarfs, boudoir caps, corset cover yokes, piano scarfs, curtains, chemises, envelopes or combination suits.

Volume 4 Twenty-five handsome designs in caps, candle shades, baby bonnets, bedspreads, dollies, library scarfs, pillows, centerpieces, portiere, medallons curtains, etc., etc.

Volume 5 Twenty-five designs in novelty and clover leaf crocheted yokes, primrose and sunflower yokes; dollies, centerpieces, boudoir caps unique edges and insertions for serving trays; novelty aprons and collars.

Aprons and collars.

Volume 6

Thirty-two designs in tatting, maltese and Irish crochet,—a varied and beautiful assortment of tatted handkerchief edges, edgings and insertions, tatted yokes, boudoir caps, towel edges, medallions; yokes, breakfast caps, centerpieces, edgings and lace in Maltese crochet and yokes in Irish crochet.

Volume 7 Thirty handsome novelty crocheted designs including rose, sunflower periwinkle, and Venetian yokes; boudoir caps, monkey face library scart, and lace pillow; large and small baskets, hat pin holder, jewel box, vanity tray coin purse, utility bag, starfish doily, pineapple centerpiece; edgings and insertions in pillow lace; daisy edging; spider, bell, rick-rack, novelty and coronation braid laces.

WE advise you to order all seven of these splendid books before the assortment is broken. If however you do not care for the whole library at this time we have arranged the following special offers which give you the opportunity to secure any two or any four or the entire seven books. Bust Bee, Ralph, Mich.—You may correspond with this young man who has a "steady" girl. But why waste your time? (2) You may write to the nice young man that you have several times refused to marry, if he wishes you to, and you are kind enough to comply in a friendly way. Better not write to a soldier boy that you have never seen; the military authorities disapprove of such correspondence.

CYRUS, Birmingham, Ala.—We are not certain that we know exactly what you mean about writing "first" to this girl after Christmas. If you had exchanged gifts, you should have written her thanking her. But there is no quarreling with a girl about how often you should write her. If she says you have not written when you should, agree to it, and write her as often as she likes.

C. D., Atlanta, Ga.—If you have a handkerchief and a picture belonging to a young lady and she has asked you for them, you must return them at once. (2) If a girl thinks you are joking when you tell her you love her, you must have told her in the wrong way. Try again, and let her see that you are serious. For true love is no joke.

BROWN EYES, Pataskala, O.—A girl of thirteen may be 'friendly' with boys, just as she should be 'friendly' with everybody. (2) A schoolgirl of thirteen wears her hair just as her mother tells her to wear it. And we hope you are as sensible as your letter, which was a very creditable one for your age.

RACHEL, Loma, W. Va.—Remember that you are not "interduced" to a man, because the gentleman is always introduced to the lady. You need do no more at the time than to bow and smile pleasantly. The man will say something, if you give him a chance. You may shake hands or not, as you choose. (2) An eighteen year old girl should not start in corresponding with a list of names of men whom she does not know. Etiquette and propriety would be very strong against it.

P. F., Carthage, Ind.—There would be certain to be some talk, even under the circumstances you mention, if you had been in the habit of riding at night two miles into the country with two young men. If you wish to avoid the gossip, you will have to get some older woman to make a part of the company. Gossip is gossip. One must either avoid it or bear it.

IN gossip. One must either avoid it or bear it.

LILY OF THE PRAIRIE, Alberta, Can.—Yeu may accept again the escort of the young man if you are thoroughly satisfied with his apology for having failed in his appointment before. The excuse given in your letter hardly reads as a sufficient one under the circumstances. Your brother's high opinion of the young man should count in the matter, however. (2) It is well not to write too many letters to young men, and your mother shows good judgment in overseeing your correspondence.

M. A., Fort Valley, Ga.—A girl of fourteen should not go automobile riding with older boys unless accompanied by her mother. (2) You may receive simple gifts of candy, books or flowers from boy friends—but no expensive gifts. Simple thanks by word or by a note is sufficient.

NANNIE AND COUNTRY GIRL, Alpena, Mich.—If you are eighteen and have a friend now fighting for Uncle Sam, etiquette would have nothing to say against your writing to or receiving friendly letters from your friend. But your mother may have some particular reason for wishing you not to answer the letters and you should be guided by her advice. Would it not be a good idea to let her see the letters? Perhaps if she read them she would be willing to let the correspondence continue.

GERALDINE, Port Huron, Mich.—It was right, as you are but sixteen, to have your older sister accompany you to the theater with the young man you mention. If you know him so slightly, you were certainly wrong in letting him hold your hand and give you the ring which you say you accepted. We think you should return this ring, simply saying that your parents object to your receiving any expensive gifts. For this is not only good etiquette, but sound common sense.

WILD WEST, Wis.—It is not necessary for you to return the Christmas gift to the young man who sent it to you and with whom you are no longer friendly. (2) You are doting quite right in refusing to receive any serious attentions from the second young man until you know him better, and more about him. As for the third young man, if you are in doubt as to whether the cares about you, how can we tell in far-off Maine?

If you are a new girl in a town where there are so few of your sex, you are sure to be popular.

DOLLY AND DIMPLES, Tabor, Iowa.—You may go with schoolboys of your high school class to parties—if your parents do not object. (2) You are certainly right to refuse attentions of any sort from boys whom you have not met before.

unless you make good use of him. George told me to tell you that if any of you cousins intend visiting Philadelphia you were to be sure to make a call on him and get a little mint sauce. Just think of millions of money being made every day and by machinery. Doesn't it make your eyes blink? George says he thinks after he has run that machine for about fifty years he will be able to invest in a dozen eggs and a potato or two. I like a man who is ambitious, but a fellow no matter how hungry should not let his hopes soar too high with food at present prices. George makes millions of dollars for Uncle Sam every week, and only charges him a hundred dollars a month for doing the job. Isn't George a noblehearted, unselfish boy? I wonder what Bryan and Rockefeller would charge for a job like that? They'd want the whole mint, and then some. George is a patriot and a credit to his country. Thank God he is not a copperhead, or a white livered pacifist.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Gousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of GOMFORT'S immense circle or eaders into one big. happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. Membership is restricted to GOMFORT subscribers and easts thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to GOMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letter's "G. L. O. G.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engressed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to GOMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have note joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Why a Man Tips His Hat

The ancient days of chivalry have given us many customs. One of these is the tipping of the hat by a gentleman when he meets a lady acquaintance or friend. Whereas the removal of the hat was formerly a habit for comfort's sake, it has now become a mark of respect and politeness.

In the days of knighthood when war seemed to be the chief business of the world, men fought with swords and spears instead of machine guns and rifles. The men were encased in armor from head to foot. The helmet, which protected the head and face of the knight, must have been even more uncomfortable than the gas masks of our khaki soldiers.

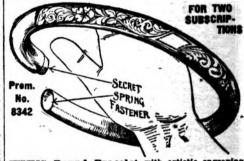

Yes, helmets, were heavy. To relieve himself of the awkward load as soon as he stepped inside his castle was the knight's homeward thought. He did the same way when he visited with friends. If a beautiful lady were present, he desired to smile upon her as soon as possible, and would take off the cumbersome helmet so that each could see the other's face. When hats displaced helmets, the custom was changed to tipping.

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as the prescription othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots. Simply get an ounce of othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength othine, as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.—Advertisement.

Dear Sir: We believe that the flat rate of a cent a pound for second-class postage has been of inestimable benefit by facilitating and promoting the dissemination of knowledge, and that the magazines, which by means of this low flat rate have been enabled to build up a nation-wide circulation spreading information to the remotest

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

Sore on Jaw.—My cow, two years old, is in good condition so far as I can see, but she has a sore on her under jaw that will not heal. It seems as though she had lost a tooth. She eats all right. R. R. B. A.—We suspect that actinomycosis (lump jaw) is the trouble present. Paint the sore once daily with the turn of iodine and inject some every other day into any discharging place. If this does not help, you will have to employ a qualified veterinarian to operate.

Obstinate Wound.—A year ago, my cow pony cut his right hind leg, just above the hock joint, on a barbed wire fence. It runs pus in places. At the top of the cut is a hole about as large as a pencil; the other place is about middle way and at one side. The leg is swellen above the joint. The sore leg does not seem to bother him any.

A.—Clip off the hair and wash the leg clean; then paint the swellen place once daily with tincture of iodine and at the same time inject into the discharging place a little of a mixture of one dram of iodoform and two ounces of sulphuric ether. It would be well to make sure that a foreign body, such as a sliver, is not present in the wound.

Alling; Warbless.—My heifer three years old this Alling; Warbles.—My heifer three years old this month is very thin, eating but little. I feed her good fodder and some corn. Her eyes are weak, as water drops from them. (2) She has warbles on her back bone. What can I do for them? What is the matter with the cow?

A.—It is to be feared that the cow has tuberculosis. To determine that, have the tuberculin test applied by a veterinarian. Meanwhile, keep her by herself and do not use her milk. The warble grub may be removed by pressing down tightly on each of them in turn with the open mouth of a large bottle; then destroy the grubs.

LUMP ON ANKLE.—Ploughing with a mule, on new ground, he stepped into a stump hole and sprained his left fore ankle and was lame for some time. A knot has come on the ankle. What will remove it? J. A. A.—These puffs are distensions filled with joint oil and are practically incurable. Some good possibly may be done by rubbing in twice daily some 10 per cent. iodine petrogen or vasogen, or by using a commercial absorbent according to directions printed on the label.

absorbent according to directions printed on the label.

FISTULA OF TEAT.—I have a cow that has a hole in left front teat a little larger than a pin hole. She loses her milk all day long. What can I do to prevent the milk from running?

A.—Until cow is dry, prevent leaking of milk by applying flexible collodion to the false opening. If that does not avail, put on a strip of surgeon's tape or plaster. When the cow is dry, have a surgeon operate, or burn the lining membrane of the fistulous tract with a red hot knitting needle and it may close.

GARGET.—I have a helfer that was two and one half years old when she brought her first calf. She was in good health and did fine for a few days. When the swelling went out of the udder she grew sick and remained so until the swelling returned, when she is better.

A.—Give the helfer a physic of epsom salts (one pound) in three pints of warm water. When it has acted, give twice daily two teaspoonfuls of powdered saltpeter and poke root in water. Milk three times a day and each night rub a little warm melted lard on the affected quarters of the udder.

FISTULA OF TEAT.—I have a two-year old heifer and in milking she has a leakage of the teat, the milk coming out about half way up the teat and also at the tip. What causes it and what is the remedy?

A.—An extra or false opening is present and it may have come from a wound of the teat wall. For the present, try the effect of a patch or bandage of surgeon's tape. When the cow is dry, the fistula may be closed by cauterization with a red hot knitting needle, or, better still, by an operation to be done by an expert surgeon.

FORAGE POISONING.—Can you tell me what was the matter with my horse? Sweaty spots came on his hips and he staggered and swayed when he walked. This began a week before he died. He fell down as though paralyzed and scemed to be weak in his parts and unable to get up, living three days after he fell. I fed him about a quart of cooked rye and all the hay he could eat.

A.—The horse died of cerebro-spinal meningitis, often called "forage poisoning," as it is caused by micro-organisms in feed. Possibly the hay contained the poison. Cooked rye, however, is quite unsuitable feed for a horse and may have caused the trouble. No certain remedy has been found for the disease mentioned. A physic may be given at the outset of an attack and followed with stimulants, but only a trained veterinarian can give appropriate treatment.

SELF-SUCKING COW.—I have a fine cow that has been sucking herself for two months. She is three years old. Is there any way to stop it? J. T. W. A.—Just put an old horse collar on the cow's neck and see how puzzled and annoyed she looks when she finds it impossible to rob her own dairy.

The Modern Farmer

Much barley also tends to cause itching skim. This grain should be rolled for horses and made a small part of the ration with oats and corn. Boiled barley, with bran, roots and chaffed hay and straw used to be popular for fattening show and sale horses.

Q. What about wheat and ryef
A. Wheat sowed with oats tends to prevent lodging, and the combination grain, sometimes called "succotash," is fine for horses, provided the proportion of wheat is small. Both wheat and rye derange the digestive organs when too liberally fed, and gorging on either grain tends to cause fatal colic (enteritis).

Q. Should work horses have green grass?
A. During the busiest season of the year horses do better if fed on oats and hay. Green grass loosens the bowels and causes "softness." Still, horses should be allowed a roll on grass at noon and night, and should rest on pasture after crops are in and harvested. Feed is so high in price, however, that the small farmer pastures his work horses as often as he can and grass taken right along is safer than a little now and then.

Q. How often should horses drink water?

A. By rights they should have it at will, and at all events at least three times a day in ordinary weather and oftener in hot weather when they work hard. Take drinking water to the field for work horses during the summer season.

field for work horses during the summer season.

Q. What causes heaves?
A. The common cause is working the horse with his digestive organs distended with coarse, bulky roughage, such as ripe timothy hay, second growth or threshed clover. Gluttonous horses contract the disease from over eating hay. Give work horses not more than one or two pounds of hay while cooling off at noon. Wet all dusty hay, preferably with lime water. So far as possible, don't work a horse immediately after a full meal.

meal.

Q. Can heaves be relieved?

A. Yes. Feed oat straw or bundles instead of hay. Wet all feed with lime water. Keep the bowels active by feeding roots and bran. Give no bulky feed at noon, and do not work the horse soon after a meal. Half an ounce of Fowler's solution of arsenic given night and morning relieves the cough and distress in breathing.

Questions and Answers

Brine for Salting Pork.—Please give me the recipe for pickle for putting down salt pork. I clipped the recipe from Comfort some time ago but it has gone astray.

Mrs. J. La R.
A.—Seven pounds salt, two pounds sugar, four ounces salt-peter to each hundred pounds of pork. Dissolve in water, boil and cool before pouring over the packed pork. Add enough water to completely cover the meat. Leave bacon for two or three weeks in this brine; hams for five or six weeks. Remove, drain and smoke with cobs or hickory wood. The same pickle may be used for dried beef.

Potato Cultivation.—We have never had any lock drain and smoke with cobs or hickory wood. The same pickie may be used for dried beef.

Potato Cultivation.—We have never had any luck in raising potatoes, so I would like to know how deep potatoes should be planted; how far apart in the row, and how far apart the rows should be. Should the potatoes be hilled or not? If so, about when and how much should they be hilled?

Mrs. T. K., Cassville, Wis.

A.—Potatoes should be planted not less than three inches deep, one foot apart in rows placed two feet eight inches to three feet apart. If potatoes are planted shallow, less than three inches deep, they should be hilled; otherwise it is not necessary. The object of hilling is to prevent the new potatoes from coming out of the ground in growing, which they will not do if planted deep. Potatoes need rich sandy or loam soil and plenty of cultivation. They will not do well on stiff clay. Bugs must not be allowed to eat the tops. To kill the bugs, spray with Paris green or arsenate of lead solution. Two or three sprayings may be required at intervals. It is the usual practice in Maine to hill at least two or three inches high about the plants. This may be done when the plants are five or six inches tall. We recommend hilling potatoes.

Moles and Carayiish.—Mrs. E. J. Walters, of Wrygross. Ga. advises using a mixture of Perls expressed.

or six inches tail. We recommend the plants are five or six inches tail. We recommend hilling potatoes.

Moles and Crayfish.—Mrs. E. J. Walters, of Wrycross, Ga., advises using a mixture of Paris green and cotton seed meal for destruction of moles and crayfish or mole crickets. She says: "Sow the poisoned meal in furrows about four inches deep and ten feet apart. These creatures like the meal and will run the furrows to eat it, and the poison will kill them. I have tried it and know it is effective."

Controlling Carrage Worms.—Mrs. M. E. W., of Hubby, Wash, writes recommending cayenne pepper as an effective remedy for cabbage worms by dusting it on the cabbages early in the morning, while the dew is on, so it will stick. The editor has known of powdered white hellebore being used in the same way for destroying cabbage worms. The objection to the use of white hellebore is that its cost has increased so since the war that it is pretty expensive for large use, and we should think cayenne pepper might be subject to the same cost objection.

Wonders of the Desert

Where everything is wonderful on the great desert of the Colorado in Southern California, still there are many unusual things that stand out prominently above the rest. In the Imperial valley, while the average depth below the level of the sea is approximately 200 feet, everything goes on as usual, with no fear that the waters of the Pacific, by way of the gulf, will rush in and overcome all. Strangely, too, the rivers run backwards—for instance, both the Alamo and New rivers take their rise from the main flow of the Colorado and pursue a tortuous course over the flow of the desert northward from the Mexican border and finally deposit their flood in Salton sea. The desert is so nearly level, there being a drop from the bed of the Colorado river of only about four feet to the mile, that at one point in the desert the main channels of the two rivers are separated by a wall of earth only thirty feet in thickness.

The salt water fish of Salton sea are another desert wonder. They are the mullet, and were introduced into the great inland sea by the shore birds flocking from the Gulf of Mexico. The eggs hatching readily in the saline waters, the increase was so rapid that it is estimated there are today millions of pounds of edible fish in the sea. The mullet attains a weight of eleven pounds, and as it feeds entirely upon vegetable matter, is delectable. Seeds of desert weeds blown into the sea keep the fish so fat that no grease is required in their cooking.

What a few years ago was an island in the sea now stands four miles from the shore, although retaining its old name—Pumice island. Here miners are busy shipping pumice at the rate of a carload per week to the eastern markets, where it is in great demand, since shipments of pumice from Europe have been stopped by the war.

I say to all,—Look to JESUS! He alone can save. I, too, shall send some poetry:

"Working will not save me;
Purest deeds that I can do,
Honest thoughts and feelings, too,
Cannot form my soul anew,
Working will not save me."

But faith in, the personal acceptance of, and the complete surrender to Jesus Christ, this will save. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved."

Because I love Him, "Evangeline."

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I love to listen but as Dolly Hull wants our opinions on a very vital question, I will endeavor to air my views, as fools step in where angels fear to tread.

The Bible is the inspired word of God, else how could the writers, writing hundreds of years apart, foretell events which actually took place thousands of years afterwards. History records events after they happen but the prophets looked away down the ages. Can she, or anyone without God, tell what is going to happen twenty-five years from now? Yet the old prophets foretold this very time of trouble. Daniel 12, Matt. 24:21 and the book of Revelations.

While a great many things in the Bible have been twisted and misconstrued to suit the different creeds, the fundamental principles are plain to anyone who truly wants to understand. Christ said, "Know the Truth and the Truth shall make you free." Also, "The Kingdom of God is within you." And when we study his Word prayerfully we will understand His mission was not to teach men how to die but to teach them how to live.

Dolly calls the Bible vulgar. To the pure all things are pure and it was sometimes necessary to call a spade a spade in order to show the people what great sins they were committing. The people of today are about where they were when the flood came and it would do them good to study that Book of books before the destroying angel again visits us.

I would write more but am afraid of the blue pencil, so will let some of the others say something.

MRS. L. S.

Poems Requested

The following poems have been requested by readers of COMFORT and sent for publication.

Gradatim; Or, The Way to Heaven

Heaven is not reached at a single bound;
But we build the ladder by which we rise
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies,
And we mount to its summit round by round.

I count this thing to be grandly true;
That a noble deed is a step toward God—
Lifting the soul from the common clod
To a purer air and a broader view.

We rise by things that are under our feet, By what we have mastered of good and gain, By the pride deposed and the passion slain, And the vanquished ill that we hourly meet.

We hope, we aspire, we resolve, we trust When the morning calls us to life and light, But our hearts grow weary and, ere the night, Our lives are trailing the sordid dust.

We hope, we resolve, we aspire, we pray And we think that we mount the air on wings Beyond the recall of sensual things, While our feet still cling to the heavy clay.

Wings for the angels, but feet for men!
We may borrow the wings to find the way—
We may hope and resolve and aspire and pray,
But our feet must rise or we fall again.

Only in dreams is a ladder thrown
From the weary earth to the sapphire walls,
But the dreams depart and the vision falls
And the sleeper wakes on his pillow of stone.

Heaven is not reached at a single bound;
But we build the ladder by which we rise
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies,
And we mount to its summit round by round.

Never Give Up

Never give up:—it is wiser and better
Always to hope, than once to despair;
Fling off the load of doubt's cankering fetters
And break the dark spell of tyrannical care.
Never give up, or the burden may sink you—
Providence kindly has mingled the cup;
And all trials and troubles bethink you,
The watchword of life must be, "Never give up!"

Never give up; there are chances and changes, Helping the hopeful a hundred to one, And through the chaos His wisdom arranges Ever success, if you'll only hold on.
Never give up; for the wisest is boldest, Knowing that Providence mingles the cup, And of all maxims, the best as the oldest, Is the stern watchword of "Never give up!"

Never give up, though the grapeshot may rattle,
Or the full thunder-cloud over you burst,
Stand like a rock, and the storm or the battle
Little shall barm you, though doing their worst.
Never give up; if adversity presses,
Providence wisely has mingled the cup;
And the best counsel in all your distress
Is the brave watchword of "Never give up!"

In the Afterglow

Sent in by Mrs. N. D. Sowles, Sutter, Cal.

Mother o' mine, in the afterglow Of mothering years, I love you so; For loving me e'er life I knew, When next your heart a new life grew; Loving me on into fair childhood, When I so little understood The long, hard way we all must go, Mother o' mine, I love you so.

Loving me, too, when life so sweet Tempted my wayward, girlish feet
Away from paths of truth and right
To paths that lead to sin's dark night;
Winning me back with loving tone
To ways that you had made your own
By struggle and stress and pain and prayer,
By love's own cords you held me there.

Mother o' mine, 'tis mine to take
The burdensome load, the stress, the ache
That come in motherhood's fair years,
The joy, the pain, the love, the tears;
'Tis mine to give what you gave me,
Mother o' mine, I would faithful be,
To the highest note in the song you taught
My girlish lips, the music fraught
With all the mother hopes and fears,
That fill to the brim the mothering years.

Mother o' mine, in the afterglow
For gifts to me from out your heart,
Of motherhood's years, I thank you so
At thoughts that rise my hot tears start;
God give me ways to make you know
How great is my love before you go Away to rest from your mothering;
I would remove life's every sting,
And give you rest in the afterglow,
For, mother o' mine, I love you so.

Whatever Is-Is Best

BY ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

I know as my life grows older
And mine eyes have clearer sight—
That under each rank wrong, somewhere,
There lies the root of right.
That each sorrow has a purpose,
By the sorrowing oft unguessed,
But as sure as the sun brings morning
Whatever is—is best.

I know that each sinful action.
As sure as the night brings shade,
Is somewhere, sometime, punished,
Though the hour be long delayed.
I know that the soul is aided,
Sometimes by the heart's unrest,
And to grow means often to suffer,
But whatever is—is best.

I know that there are no errors,
In the great eternal plan,
And all things work together,
For the final good of man.
I know as my soul speeds onward,
In its grand eternal quest,
I shall say as I look back earthward,
Whatever is—is best.

Be Careful in Using Soap on Your Hair

Most soaps and prepared shampoos contain too much alkali, which is very injurious, as it dries the scalp and makes the hair brittle.

The best thing to use is just plain mulsified cocoanut oil, for it is pure and entirely greaseless. It's very cheap, and beats the most expensive soaps or anything else all to pieces. You can get this at any drug store, and a few ounces will last the whole family for months.

Simply moisten the hair with water and rub it in, about a teaspoonful is all that is required. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, cleanses thoroughly, and rinses out easily. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and is soft, fresh looking, bright, fluffy, wavy, and easy to handle. Besides, it loosens and takes out every particle of dust, dirt and dandruff.—Advertisement.

The Stars Of Our Country is the title of this handsomely bound book concerning our own great country the United States of America. Every patriotic American should have a copy. The children especially will enjoy it on account of the many pictures it contains. This is an intensely patriotic work, treating of each state in the Union, hence the title, "Each State a Star and Each Star a State." It contains a beautiful poem dedicated to each state, by William Lightfoot Visscher, the seal of that state, and on the opposite page facing the poem and seal is a handsome picture representing some particular thing, personage or place for which the state is noted. In all there are fifty three beautiful full-page illustrations, which together with the pictorial seals, illuminate the book from cover to cover. Added to the work are also the verses of our leading Battle Hymns, a portrait of President Wilson, and his great message and historical document, which will be preserved by all. We would like to see a copy of this book in every COMFORT home because it is a volume rich in historical value. The poems and the pictures are very effective as well as pleasing and will deeply impress you.

We will send you a copy of "The Stars of Our Country" bound in fine silk finish cloth, stamped with emblematic design, free upon the terms of the following

These City Physicians Explain Why They Prescribe Nuxated Iron

To Make Healthier Women and Stronger, Sturdier Men

NOW BEING USED BY OVER THREE MILLION PEOPLE ANNUALLY

By enriching the blood and creating thousands of new red blood cells, it often quickly transforms the flabby flesh, toneless tissues, and pallid cheeks of weak, anaemic men and women into a glow of health. Increases the strength of delicate, nervous, run-down folks in two weeks' time in many instances.

T is conservatively estimated that over three million people annually in this country alone are taking Nuxated Iron. Such astonishing results have been reported from its use both by doctors and laymen, that a number of physicians in various parts of the country have been asked to explain why they prescribe it so extensively, and why it apparently produces so much better results than were obtained from the old forms of inorganic iron.

Extracts from some of the letters received are

Dr. Ferdinand King, a New York Physician and Medical Author, says: "There can be no vigorous iron men without iron. Pallor means anaemia.

"Anaemia means iron deficiency. The skin of anaemic men and women is pale; the flesh flabby. The muscles lack tone. the brain fags and and they become weak, nervous, irritable, despondent and melancholy. When the iron goes from the blood of women the roses go from their cheeks.

"In the most common foods of America, the starches, sugars, table syrups, candies, polished rice, white bread, soda crackers, biscuits, macaroni, spaghetti, tapioca, sago, farina, degerminated corn-meal, no longer is iron to be found. Refining processes have removed the iron of Mother Earth from these impoverished foods, and silly methods of home cookery, by throwing down the wastepipe the water in which our vegetables are cooked, is responsible for another grave iron

"Therefore you should supply the iron deficiency in your food by using some form of organic iron, just as you would use salt when your food has not enough salt."

Dr. A. J. Newman, late Police Surgeon of the City of Chicago and former House Surgeon, Jef-ferson Park Hospital Chicago

Dr. A. J. Newman, late Police Surgeon of the City of Chicago and former House Surgeon, Jefferson Park Hospital, Chicago, in commenting on Nuxated Iron, says; "It has been my particular duty during the past six years to assist in keeping Chicago's five thousand blue-coats in good health and perfect fighting trim so that they would be physically equipped to withstand all manner of storms and the ravages of nature's elements.

"Recently I was prompted through an endorsement of Nuxated Iron by Dr. Schuyler C. Jaques, Visiting Surgeon of St. Elizabeth's Hospital, New York, to give it a trial. This remedy has proven through my own tests of it to excel any preparations I have ever used for creating red blood, building up the nerves. strengthening the muscles and correcting digestive disorders."

Formerly Physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.) New York, and the Dr. James Francis Sullivan, Westchester County Hosformerly physician of Bellevue pital.

Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), N. Y., and the Westchester County Hospital, said: "I have strongly emphasized the great necessity of physicians making blood examinations of their weak, anaemic, run-down patients. Thousands of persons go on year after year suffering from physical weakness and a highly nervous condition due to lack of sufficient iron in their red blood corpuscles, without even realizing the real and true cause of their trouble. Without iron in your blood your food merely passes through the body, somewhat like corn through an old mill with rollers so wide apart that the mill can't grind.

Dr. James Francis Sullivan,

"But in my opinion you can't make strong, vigorous, successful, sturdy iron men by feeding them on metallic iron. The old forms of metallic iron must go through a semi-digestive process to transform them into organic iron-Nuxated Iron-before they are so ready to be taken up and assimilated by the human original packages and see that this particular name (Nuxated Iron) appears on the package. If you have taken preparations such as Nux and Iron and other similar Iron products and failed to get results, remember that such products are an entirely different thing from Nuxated Iron.'

Dr. Schuyler C. Jaques, Visiting Surgeon of St. Elizabeth's Hospital, of New York City, said: "I have never before given out any medical information or advice for publication, as I ordinarily do not believe in it. But in the case of Nuxated Iron I feel I would be remiss in my duty not to mention it. I have taken it myself and given it to my patients with most surprising and satisfactory results. And those who wish quickly to increase their strength, power and endurance will find it a most remarkable and wonderfully effective remedy."

Dr. T. Alphonsus Wallace, a physician of many years' experience in this country and who has been given many honorary titles in England, says: "I do not make a practice of recommending advertised medicinal products. but I have found Nuxated Iron so potent in nervous, run-down conditions, that I believe all should know of it. The men and women of today need more iron in their blood than was the case twenty or thirty years ago. This because of the demineralized diet which now is served daily in thousands of homes and also because of the demand for greater resistance necessary to offset the greater number of health hazards, to be met at every turn.'

If people would only take Nuxated Iron when they feel weak or run-down, instead of with habit-forming drugs, stimulants and alcoholic beverages, there are probably thousands who might readily build up their red blood corpuscles, increase their physical energy selves into a con-

Numbers of nervous, run-down people who were ailing all the while have most astonishingly increased their strength and endurance simply by taking iron in the proper form. And this, after they had in some cases been going on for months without getting benefit from anything. Many an athlete and prize-fighter has won the day simply because he knew the secret of great strength and endur-ance which comes from having plenty of iron in the blood; while many another has gone down in inglorious defeat simply for lack of iron.

MANUFACTURER'S NOTE: Nuxated Iron, which is MANUFACTURER'S NOTE: Nuxated Iron, which is prescribed and recommended above by physicians, is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is easily assimilated, does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser, or they will refund your money. It is dispensed by all good druggists and general stores.—Advertisement.

Mrs. W. M., Beatrice, Mont.—To tan a horse hide for a robe, proceed as follows: Stretch the skin tightly on some smooth surface and thoroughly remove every particle of flesh from the hide, scraping carefully with a dull knife. Then wash with a strong soap suds and stretch out on a framework, flesh side up, to dry. After it is almost dry, sprinkle with a mixture of three parts salt to one part of powdered alum. Leave the hide in this condition for a week or more—renewing the mixture if the hide absorbs it. Then wash again with a strong soap suds and stretch again to dry, always in the open air, but protected from the rain. When of the proper dryness to proceed, the hide should be carefully scraped in places where it is too thick and heavy until it is of even texture. Now place in a tub or box containing hardwood sawdust, and render the hide flexible by treading it with the bare feet—this is an Indian method, and a good one. The sawdust absorbs all moisture. Now dry again and brush. The process of treading it, drying it and brushing may have to be repeated many times, for it is difficult to prepare so large a skin at home with success.

continued proof professible the chef could have left the room and come back without my knowledge."

Carrousel came next,—a tall man with a short, dark beard, and very blue eyes. He was neatly dressed in a black coat and gray trousers, and looked most unlike a cook.

On being sworn and interrogated, he shook his head.

"I can tell you nothing, monsieur," he said.
"I was not well; my teeth were aching; I walked the floor in the housekeeper's room. I heard nothing."
"Yes.

the floor in the housekeeper's room. I heard nothing."

"What time did you go there?"

"At ten o'clock. At twenty minutes past eleven they came and told me his lordship was dying."

His florid face paled a little.

One juror asked if he had not heard Sir Thomas' dog barking in the kitchen.

"No, monsieur." respectfully. "The housekeeper's room is some distance from the kitchen. I heard no noise. I was glad to sit by the fire. perhaps to doze. It was as well, perhaps. I have had no sleep since. Milord was an excellent patron to me. He understood eating."

There was a listness detachedness in his voice, as of a stranger who is utterly apart from his surroundings.

"What did you serve his lordship for dinner?" the coroner said suddenly.

"It was not that which killed him," Carrousel returned gravely, "since the whole society partook of the same plates. My-cooking does not give even an indigestion, much less death. Monsieur does not mean that he suspects me?" patenty.

session absolutely nothing with a smell of bitter almonds, which could have been stolen and added to the bottle to hide some other taste.

The jury stirred impatiently—there had been no question of poison in the dinner—till it suddenly occurred to them that from the coroner's minute questions Carrousel had been obliged to account for every instant of his time from six o'clock till twenty minutes past eleven. If there had been any juggling with bottles in Levallion's dressing-room, the busy cook could have had no hand in it; for the kitchen maids' evidence tallied with his.

something. But his lordship put him off."

A little rustle of interest ran along the jurors' bench.

"Then if it was Lord Levallion's own liqueur he drank, you contend it was poisoned during the evening?"

"I'm certain of it, sir."

"Did Lord Levallion to your knowledge possess any poison?"

"No!" said Lacy, flatly. "If you mean he committed suicide, it's out of the question. His lordship was more contented than he had ever been in his life—or since I knew him. Somebody gave it to him!"

"Was he on bad terms with any one?"

"Plenty of people!" calmly; "but none of them would be likely to do it. I might about as well accuse her ladyship of doing it as sensibly as any of the"—he stammered—"the others!"

"Do you mean Lord and Lady Levallion were not on good terms?" sharply.

"I didn't mean to imply that, sir," flushing. "I said, and I think, Lord Levallion was more than happy. I never heard of any trouble between the two, except that last night I did hear them having a few words about going out or something, as I was passing through the hall. But it was nothing at all, sir!" hastily. "I beg you don't think I'm insinuating anything against my lady."

"Were you not in Lord Levallion's dressing-recond during the against my?"

But it was nothing at all, sir? nastly. To beg you don't think I'm insinuating anything against my lady."

"Were you not in Lord Levallion's dressing-room during the evening?"

"No, sir! I left it all neat, and was gone down-stairs almost as soom as his lordship left the room. I never went to his dressing-room of an evening till I was rung for."

"You did not touch the bottle?"

"Yes, sir! I put it up on the shelf, and I scatched my hand on it for about the tenth time. It was a rough-made, molded bottle, with a sort of, seam down each side, and time and again I've caught a scratch inside my hand from that rough seam."

"Were you alone in the room?"

"No, sir; his lordship's second man was with me. It was not either of us that tampered with the bottle."

"Is that it?" The coroner pointed to some fragments of glass on a tray.

"Is that it?" The coroner pointed to some fragments of glass on a tray.

"I couldn't say." Lacy fingered each scrap slowly; none were bigger than a shilling. He looked up suddenly. "In my opinion it isn't!" he said. "But you will understand that in the state the bottle is it can be only my opinion. I wouldn't like to swear to it, but I think it. All I can say is that it is bits of glass and label which might be the one that was in the dressing-room. I wouldn't swear it is the same."

"Will you swear it is not?" sharply.

Lacy took the fragments and dust of paperlabeled glass to the light; went over each bit with the seeing fingers of a blind man, as well as faultless eyesight.

as faultiess eyesight.
"It's not the same bottle," he said, after what seemed an hour. "There's a pink smear on the label. His lordship's bottle, when I left it, was clean."

"That does not prove it a different bottle," judicially. "Only perhaps that some one touched it."

"To the best of my belief," returned Lacy, doggedly, "that is not his lordship's bottle. I can't find the seam on any of the pieces."

"Or in the dust," said a juror scathingly.

But Lacy stuck to his opinion and was let go. For some reason, and to Houghton's wonder, the coroner never mentioned that rag of tweed.

A frightened footman took his place, who had taken coffee to the ladies after dinner.

"Were all the ladies in the room then?" asked Aston.

"yes, that is—no, sir! I took in coffee and a note for her ladyship," stammering, "and she gets up and leaves the room and Lady Gwendolen Brook after her."

"With her." the coroner half-corrected.

"Just as you say, sir, abjectly. "I'd got out in the hall with my tray when Lady Gwendolen came out and ran up-stairs after her ladyship," oh!" said the coroner, quietly; "you can go." he called Lady Gwendolen for the next witness, and Houghton's mouth tightened.

He remembered how the women had stood when he arrived,—how aloof, how ironical. If he were not mistaken, the drama would begin with the new witness.

AY is such a made-to-be-happy month that I am sure I could be the happiest mortal alive were it not for the depressing letters I receive from you girls; but them, I couldn't help you if you didn't tell me your troubles and worries, could I, and it is such a comfortable feeling to know that I am of some good in the world. Some have every reason for being unhappy, and writing deep, dark, indigo letters, while others just think they have, but I suppose a fancied sorrow hurts just awfully until a real one is experienced; but I hope yours will all be fancied ones and that your best day of the past may be the worst day of the future. And now for the letters.

The first letter is from Lily of the Valley, Cadyville, N. Y., a girl of fifteen, who wants to know if she is old enough to use paint and powder and go to dances. And still they say, "What's in a name?" From the nature of your questions you should sign yourself Poppy, Hollyhock or Sundower or anything but a little modest lily of the valley. You are not old enough to use paint and powder, and if you were ten years older my answer would be the same, especially about the paint, though a tiny bit of powder—just enough to take the shine off your nose—is permissible, but don't use paint. Go to dancing school and to private dancing parties, but stay away from grown-up dances for a few years. To be fair with you, your letter was exceptionally well written.

Six Wheel Chairs in April

461 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

This gain of two wheel chairs over March is encouraging. Let us try to boost it at least two

The six April wheel chairs go to the following shut ins, and the figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them

Leone Waldron, R. R. I, Clinton, Wash., 186; Nellie Edmonds, Natural Bridge, Ala., 157; Celesta Mullins, Ash Grove, Mo., 129; Harlon Berl Lane, R. R. I, Lindale, Texas, 126; Mrs. Mary Green, R. R. 6, Troy, Ala., 122; Alma Latrell Adams, R. R. 3, Danielsville, Georgia, 121

Leone Waldron, age II, has suffered from curvature of the spine about a year and a half. She is unable to stand or even sit up and paralysis is feared. There are five children in the family and the chair will be a pleasure to Leone and a help to her mother in caring for her.

Nellie Edmonds, age 15, has been a cripple all her life and never able to walk, but she can use her hands and will be able to move her wheel chair about.

Celesta Mullins writes of herself thus: "I am a little girl 15 years old. I got a fall when I was two and a half years old, and it brought on spinal trouble and a half years old, and it brought on spinal trouble and I have been a cripple ever since, not able to walk. My sister takes COMFORT and I read your wheel-chair offer Will you please write and tell me just how I can get me a wheel chair, as we are not able to buy one." She writes a beautiful hand and her spelling is perfect, putting to shame many young people who have had school advantages of which she has been deprived. which she has been deprived.

Harlon Berl Lane, age 8, has been a cripple all his life from spinal trouble and could never walk. He has grown too heavy to be carried about by his parents and very much needs a wheel chair.

Mrs. Mary Green, age 77, fell and broke her hip four years ago, and since the accident has not been able to walk. She is a widow and unable to buy a wheel chair, and the one which her friends have obtained for her, with COMFORT'S help, will be a blessing to her.

Alma Adams, age 6, is another poor little cripple who has suffered all her life from spinal trouble and can not walk or talk. But she is bright and has the use of her hands; so her mother thinks she can soon learn to handle her wheel chair.

The cases of crippled children deprived of all the active pleasures of youth seem especially sad to me. I have on my list a large number of equally touching appeals from child cripples suffering for wheel chairs. I know that all our good people are busy with war work, but surely you can still find some time to get subscriptions to help relieve the poor shut-ins. Your name would look well in our next month's Roll of Honor.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 25 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL. CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours. Any shut-in who has friends to help him get subscriptions can obtain a wheel chair free. Write me for information.

Says Her Wheel Chair Surely Is a Comfort

BAGLEY, MINN.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I received my COMFORT wheel chair, and it surely is a comfort to me, as I can get around now so easily in it. I thank you and all the kind friends for helping me get it. Your grateful friend, MARY OLSEN.

Appreciation and Thanks

DOVER, N. C.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I certainly did appreciate the chair received from you last January for Mrs. Emily Daugherty, and would have written you before but have been waiting to get her picture taken so to send you one. I have not succeeded yet as no one has been around here taking pictures. Mrs. Daugherty is very grateful for the chair and wishes me to send you her thanks, to which I add my own. Truly yours,

Mrs. Walter Glover.

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

Mrs. J. C., Johannesburg, Mich.—The only reliable way to diagnose diabetes mellitus—"sugar diabetes"— is by the chemical test of the suspected urine, or the yeast test. Have your local physician make the test. In general the disease is not curable, but can be held in check by diet and treatment and one can live years if of mature age when the disease is first noted.

D. M., Ilog. Occ. Negros, P. I.—Trouble is probably some liver trouble. May be gall stones. Try having her use freely olive oil with her meals. This failing, have an exploratory operation, if the symptoms are severe enough to require it.

severe enough to require it.

R. D. L., McAlisterville, Pa.—You evidently had a heat stroke, and must avoid hereafter exposing yourself to the sun's rays in the summer. When it is necessary to go out in the sun, use a hat that will protect your head from the rays. You should eat little meat, keep your bowels free, avoid pastry, bathe frequently, using the spinal douche, described in Common so often, and, in short, lead the "simple life" until you gain your usual health.

MRS. C. A. B., Nersana, Alaska.—Your dreams are more or less a habit. Try eating a very small supper. Have your main meal at noon. Drink plenty of water and exercise freely in the open air. Just before you retire, try the cold spinal douche, with massage.

retire, try the cold spinal douche, with massage,

Mrs. J. T. S., Magnolia, Minn.—You need glasses, no doubt. After you have gotten the right glasses, if your double vision still continues, have the extrinsic muscles of your eyes tested and see if they work together all right. You also have catarrh of the nose. Try Dobell's solution as a spray three times a day.

Mrs. S. A. G., Lineville, Ala.—There is no cure for paralysis. Have your blood-pressure taken, and follow out the instructions of your family physician, as to diet, keeping the bowels open, taking massage and eating proper amount and quality of food.

Mrs. M. O. C., Bardwell, Ky.—Use only liquid vaseline, known as aloline, in the ear. If your ear discharges, you should consult a specialist and have the ears treated. If the ears do not stop discharging and you continue to have pain, have the mastoid operation done and get at the seat of the trouble.

Mrs. M. P., East Akron, Ohio,—The best way to MRS, M. P., East Akron, Ohio.—The best way to remove your moles is by the use of the electric cautery. It takes only a moment, is practically painless and very effective. Consult some good local physician. COMFORT does not furnish addresses or place manuscript.

N. S., Alliance, Neb.—There is no bust developer worth using. Gentle massage might help you.
"INQUIRER," Shamoken, Pa.—Your trouble is due to an excessive stimulation of the salivary glands. It will not inpair your health. Some form of belladonna might help you, but this must be prescribed by your local physician.

"FARMER'S WIFE," Michigan.—Pregnancy will not cure floating kidney. An operation is indicated, and is the only cure in your case.

Mrs. E. S., Seiling, Okla.—You undoubtedly have gall stones, or some obstruction to the common bile duct. If you cannot have an operation immediately, use large quantities of olive oil with your meals. This will remove them in some cases.

MRS. D. F. B., Freeland, Ohio.—Your pain is of rheumatic origin, probably. Turpentine stoupes applied to the neck will help you, using a few drops of turpentine on a hot, wet flannel. Apply to the neck until the skin is quite red. You should regulate your diet, drink plenty of water and keep your bowels free at all times.

MRS. A. S., St. Joe, Missouri.—Tonics, fresh air, liberal diet, avoidance of pastry, frequent baths—tonic cold baths to the spine as recommended in COMFORT—is the line of treatment that promises best results in your case. Petuitrin extract, given by your family physician, is the latest treatment for the bed wetting referred to.

Mr. H. H. S., Lehr, Neb.—The Dobell's solution prayed into the nose three or four times a day will help your catarrh.

H. P. S., Casterland, N. Y.—There is no cure for asthma. Besides operation, would advise change to the seashore. Sometimes a decided change of climate will effectually remove the exciting cause of asthmatic trouble and effect a cure.

trouble and effect a cure.

H. P. S., Casterland, New York.—There is no cure known as "itch." It can be cured by using some form of sulphur ointment. The following ointment can be applied at night: Precipitated sulphur sixty grains to the ounce of vaseline. Apply all over body from neck to feet for four nights only, to be followed by a hot bath and entire change of clothes.

At her funeral the house was full, we all had a strange, conscience-stricken feeling. Helen Lester I did not see there. science-stricken feeling. Helen Lester I did not see there. When the service was over a tall, elderly man who was a stranger in town began to speak:

"This woman,' he pointed at the dead face, 'was killed as Shakespeare says by slanderous tongues. You question how she made her money. Let me tell you. She left this town forty-seven years ago penniless, untrained, young and lovely to wander the streets of New York for days searching for work. When she was reduced to fifty cents she took the only position which had been offered her, work she shrank from in horror as any young girl might have done. She became assistant to an undertaker. She stayed on in the business, not because she liked it or because she was making a good income, but as she told me once because it was a calling which cried aloud for tender, decent women. She knew however that it meant the severing of every home tie. In those days you Southern women disdained work, what would you have thought of her toil? Her career later took her to the far West where she carried comfort into many a bereaved home. The ministry of her gentle hands is not yet forgotten by many a stricken mother.

"At last she wanted a rest. She had earned money enough to spend the rest of her life in comfort and as she told me her heart cried aloud for home. She shrank from the curious eyes and curious questions she would meet. Still she faced you. How would you have treated her if you had known the truth? Would you have been kindlier than you were? Only the lie, the black, monstrous, foul lie begotten and spread by one woman as I have discovered, a woman who has hated Margaret Pond all her life, that killed her. The doctor tells me she had heard it, she knew you believed it and it sent her to her grave. Nothing, so it seems to me, which can be dealt out at the Judgment seat, is too terrible for the woman with the serpent's tooth." "Next morning Helen Lester left town. If she had not—" the woman beside me shuddered, "nobody knows what might have lappened. White folks have been lync

Daughter of a Philosopher

Louisa helped her sister May in her art studies, but she did not give up her writing. She usually spent her summers in Concord, but she could work better in Boston, so in winter that city became her home. In 1877 her mother died. In her journal Louisa said:

"I never wish her back, but a great warmth seems gone out of my life, and there is no motive to go on now. I think I shall soon follow her, and am quite ready to go, now she no longer needs me."

But one who had done so much for the sake of others was to do more still. Sister May died in Paris, and her infant daughter was sent to Louisa who rather moodily wrote:

"May wished me to have her baby and her pictures. A precious legacy! Rich payment for the little I could do for her. I see now why I lived—to care for May's child and not leave Anna all alone.

"Courage and patience there I set."

"Courage and patience, these I ask, Dear Lord, in this my latest strait; For hard I find my ten years' task, Learning to suffer and to wait."

The main interest for the next few years was the care of May's child and the attention given her father who was now growing old. She became an excellent mother to little Lulu, and the bright baby seems to have added a warm cheer to the heart of Miss Alcott.

Her philosophical father died in 1882, also the year of Mr. Emerson's passing, Louisa was so ill herself that she did not know her loss, and her death occurred soon. Louisa's life was one of ceaseless labor, unwearied kindness and self-sacrifice.

Spade and Hoe to Befriend the Rifle and the Bayonet

War is making bare the world's cupboards; the granaries are being emptied, the flocks thinned, the herds butchered, the mines scraped. War is making everything dear except human life; the destructive monster is consuming more food essentials than it is producing. Want follows hard in the wake of the chariot wheels of Mars, and the whole world is threatened with hunger, the menace of which will become greater with the prolongation of hostilities. Victory will go to the combatants who are best fed and nourished. The food question is now paramount. Food production is as essential to victory as food saving..... The spade and the hoe must befriend the rifle and the bayonet.—British Ministry of Food.

Ellis Island as it is Today By C. L. Cheever

TEAR after year millions of people from all over Europe enter America through the greatest gateway the world has ever known, that portal of Ellis Island.

The majority of the 15,000,000 foreign-born people in the United States have had some experience there—for Ellis Island station has not borne a reputation always for kindness. There has been much suffering there. Many have been detained, some have been sent back much suffering there. Many have been detained, some have been sent back.

But today the first thing that greets your eye is a great playground out on the lawn with hundreds of men, women and children resting there. There are tents to keep off the sun and rain. There are swings and sand piles for the children tents to keep off the sun and rain. There are swings and sand piles for the children

The European war has converted Ellis Island into agreat detention camp with six or eight hundred men, women and children who, for some reason or other could not enter the country and were held there waiting for the war to end. They had nothing to do. They sat day after day on the hard benches, provided for them and thought of their homes and their friends. The first day they went to the lawn they rolled upon it. They played with it. The tears rolled down their cheeks. The appetites of the children got better. Life became brighter. The whole island changed.

In the room where the immigrants are examined before they are admitted to this country, the same change is found. It used to be like a prison. There were high gratings on either side, so high that a man could not see over them. They have all been taken down. Round about the walls are rows of potted plants and flowers. The place looks like a garden. From the galleries above the American flags float, while round about the walls there are fine pictures of the presidents of the United States.

At noon there is music. On Sundays a concert is given by the Hungarians, the Germans, the Sootch, the Poles, the Bohemians or the Italians. For every

Asks Army Board to Take Husband

The local examining board for the selective conscription act in Gullatin county, Montana, is treasuring a literary gem which has come under their eyes in the course of their official labors. It was written from a wife who evidently considers her husband better in the army than out. The letter says: "Dear United States Army: My husband ast me to write you a rekommend that he supports his fambly. He cannot read so don't tell him. Just take him. He ain't no good to me. He ain't done nothing but drink lemmonade essence and play a fidle since I married him eight years ago, and I gotta feed seven kids of his. Don't tell him, but just take him."

A Useful Monkey

An Italian organ grinder possessed a monkey which he "worked" through the summer months. When the cool days came his business fell off, and he discontinued his walks and melodies. An Irishman of his acquaintance offered him half a crown for the privilege of keeping and feeding the little beast. The bargain was made for a month. Great curiosity filled the mind of the Italian, and at last he went ostensibly to see his pet, but really to find out what possible use Pat could make of the monkey.

What They're Made Of

Passing through a military hospital, a distinguished visitor noticed a private in one of the Irish regiments who had been terribly injured.

To the orderly the visitor said: "That's a bad case. What are you going to do with him?"

"He's going back, sir!" replied the orderly.

"Going back!" said the visitor in surprised tones.

"Yes" said the orderly. He thinks he knows who did it."

Dound to Get Married

A young factory hand and his girl went to get married. They got as far as the church, when he found out he had not enough money to pay the wedding fee. The clergyman would not marry them, saying, "No money, no wedding." "Pleathe, thir," lisped the latest graduate from the infant class, "where ith the flea?"

So the girl asked would he wait till she went home for the money. The clergyman said "yes." In a little while the girl returned with the money and the knot was duly tied. The girl now said to the clergyman: "Can anyone oppose our union?" To which he replied: "Nobody, my daughter. Heaven bless you."

"And what?"

It never came to her that she might be inflicting untold agony upon a bereaved mother's heart in requiring her to go over these fearful details.

Every sense was locked and concentrated upon that one frenzied thought.

"And they told me that many grown people also having been killed, there were none to claim the little bodies, and they had been obliged to hury them in nameless graves. From my description of my darling, they believed she must have been among the number."

Mrs. Stillman never forgot the look which swept over that statuesque face as she related these facts.

Mrs. Stillman never forgot the look which swept over that statuesque face as she related these facts.

Day and night it haunted her like an accusing angel while she lived, and it was almost more than her hardened heart could even now bear to meet with composure.

"I went to those little graves," she continued. and wept over them all, not knowing which to call mine, and then I came away to live out my and life alone."

An utter silence fell upon them after she had concluded, which lasted several minutes.

It was broken at last by a long, shuddering sigh from Sibyl.

"It was very sad. I do not see how you could have borne it; but—I do not feel very well. I think I must go home now."

She said it in a dazed sort of way, trying at the same time to rise from her chair.

"I should not have told you," said Mrs. Stillman, looking up, half, frightened, into her colorless face. "I ought to have known that it would have shocked you; but you will come again? You do not know, miss, how I am getting to watch for your coming," she concluded, eagerly.

The words struck a death-like chill to the fair girl's heart.

girl's heart.

Come again? If all she believed were true, she vould have to come and—stay.

"Yes, I will come again," she answered, wearily, and, mechanically putting on her hat and cloak, she blindly groped her way into the street, entered the carriage, and was driven home.

She was so glad that Raymond and his mother vere out, and there was no one to see her white face nor question her as to its cause when she entered.

She crept upstairs to here sce nor question her as to its cause when she entered.

She crept upstairs to her own room, locked the door, and, throwing herself upon a couch, tried to think.

She had always pictured her mother as some noble, beautiful lady; delicate, refined, and highly cultured—as some one toward whom she would instantly be drawn, and whom she should instantly recognize through intuition.

Could she call this woman, who seemed so common, and who rather repelled than attracted her, by the sacred name which she had always so longed to utter?

Her whole soul rebelled against it, and yet the more she thought the more she became convinced that her surmises were correct.

Two long hours she battled with herself, and prayed for a right spirit. But no answer, no reace came—all the brightness seemed suddenly to have gone out of her life, and a gloom, like a pall, settled down upon her.

A rap came at length upon her door.

Striving for calmness, she arose and opened it. Raymond stood without, a smile on his lips, a tender love-light in his fine eyes.

But after one glance, both smile and light suddenly faded, and with an exclamation of dismay, he reached out his arms and inclosed her.

"My darling, what troubles you—why are you so pale and hollow-eyed?" he asked, in great anxiety.

"I do not feel well, Ray," she answered, letting her head droop wearily against him.

so pale and hollow-eyed?" he asked, in great anxiety.

"I do not feel well, Ray," she answered, letting her head droop wearily against him.

"Where have you been?—and what have you been doing that you should look like this?" he femanded, searching the hopeless, despairing face in perplexity.

But she could not tell him—she could tell no fene until she knew more; she must be very sure herself, and bring her mind to bear the great thange more calmly, before she could even confide in him. So she only said:

"I went out several hours ago to see Mrs. Stillman, and began to feel ill before leaving her rooms; but it will pass, I shall feel better soon."

"I shall go down and send father up to prescribe for you immediately; I am alarmed," Raymond said, regarding her earnestly.

"No, Ray, please don't; I am not really ill. Afew hours of rest will make me all right again," she pleaded.

She could not have Sir Athelstone question her;

she pleaded.

She could not have Sir Athelstone question her; she did not want to see him, nor any one now, and the sight of Raymond himself almost unserved her again, although it was very comforting to feel his protecting care.

But if this phantom, which seemed so relentlessly pursuing her, should take visible, tangible shape, what then?

The Prescotts were very proud, and their only son and heir would never be allowed to lower himself by mating with the child of a poor, unknown woman like Mrs. Stillman, How could she bear it?

it?
She looked around her beautiful rooms; every object within them was dear to her, and must she go away and leave everything behind her?
Her very soul shrank back appalled at the sacrifice, and Raymond, holding her close to him, felt the sudden thrill of agony which shook her from head to foot.
"My darling, you are certainly very ill—you have been where they have fever, and caught it," he exclaimed.

And his clasp tightened, as if he would allow mothing to wrest her from him.

He led her to the couch and made her lie down, covering her with a soft shawl. He brought a bottle of eau de cologne and bathed her hot head, soothing her with fond and gentle words, until she did indeed seem to be growing more composed and natural.

Gradually the look of pain died out of her face, the heavy, sorrow-laden lids drooped over her eyes, the thought-wearied brain grew quiet, the tense muscles relaxed, and Sibyl slept.

"Well, Jude, I should say you were in a hurry," Ada remarked, as she threw herself into a chair by the kitchen stove, and watched her movements with some amusement.

"Hasn't the little fool but just gone?" Miss Therwin sneeringly inquired.

While becoming used to the looks of the darker breads, we are discovering that they provide a more substantial and nourishing article of diet.

And this is going to teach us something else. As we can get along without undue style in bread, which was all it amounted to, so we can get along and be content with much less of style in other things. We are going to learn, before this war is over and our country's affairs have become readjusted, that it is not positively necessary to purchase a new suit of clothes on the exact moments become too out-of-date to give the wearer any pleasure, they will, with the aid of new patterns, be made to do further service by our noble women, who are tryly large tryl and the home unfashionable to show undue ostentation, even when there is wealth back of it. There is going to be public criticism of men and women who spend more than they can afford on food, clothing, shelter and equipage.

Studied food economy has brought about new table manners. It has restored the breadboard to its proper place, on the dining table, from which bread is cut and served as wanted, which prevents great waste. Everything is passed, individual dishes being tabooed, and etiquette demands that one shall serve to himself only what he is sure of eating, not taking food to be toyed with on the plate. Refuse point blank what you do not care for, and remember that the cleaner the plate the better the manners. Wastefulness has become unfashionable, in bad taste, and the lessons learned while thrift, economy and simplicity are required by the conditions of war will be carried into the future and result in a happier living for those, at least, who have struggled so strenuously to keep up with a speedy procession in the matter of spending.

"How so? Have you related her history to the little simpleton at last?"

"At last! Pray how long did you think it was going to take to get through with such a delicate piece of business as you have set me to do?" demanded her companion somewhat sharply.

"I do not mean to be unreasonable, Judith," apologized Miss Therwin, "but it's two weeks now since she first came here, and I must confess that I am somewhat impatient, for that young Prescott has neither eyes nor ears for any one else when am somewhat impatient, for that young Prescott has neither eyes nor ears for any one else when she is around."

"What do you care for him? You have had scores of offers from men in a higher position than he occupies, and might have as many more."

"That is all very true, but I have found even during my few years of social life, that there is quite a difference between fops, swells, dandles, and—men," Miss Therwin remarked, with rather scornful emphasis.

"Ahem! and how would you class the other sex?" quietly inquired Judith, but with a droll expression in her black eyes.

Miss Therwin colored.
"That is neither here nor there," she said, tartly; "I am interested in Mr. Prescott; he is a man to whom one could look up, and be proud of; he will make his mark in the world some time, and I mean that he shall yet ask me to share his future. But if we don't get Sibyl out of the way pretty soon, I'm afraid he will propose to her, if he has not done so already, though I hardly think things have gone so far as that yet."

yet."
"What leads you to that conclusion?"
"She wears no engagement ring, and there has been no announcement of anything of the kind."
"Well, the change in her circumstances may make no difference with him," Judith replied.
"Pshaw! do you suppose a man in his position would marry her when he finds out who and what she is?"

would marry her when he had she is?"

"Is?"

"Well, of course, you know I mean what she is, made to believe she is; it will amount to the same thing." qualified Miss Therwin.

"It might make no difference with him, even then. She would remain the same, and, if he loved her, he might make her his wife in spite of everything." persisted Judith.

"I tell you be never would compromise himself in any such way," Ada cried, angrily.

"But some men will do a great deal for love, you know."

"It can't be that you argue from experience," sneered Ada, hotly.

Judith's face grew a sudden scarlet; then the angry tide receding, left her very pale.

Her black eyes glowed with passion, but there was a look of intense pain about her mouth.

"I advise you not to try me too far, Miss Ada," she said, with a sort of fierce calmness that made Miss Therwin wince. "That is a subject which is never to be touched upon again between us."

"Well well, I promise not to twit upon facts any more, only when you argue against me it angers me, and I do not stop to think what I am saying. But you have not yet told me how much you accomplished today," Ada replied, changing the tone of her remarks.

Judith related her whole interview with Sibyl, much to Miss Therwin's entertainment.

"Then you believe she will fall into the trap?" she asked, when she had finished.

"I have no doubt of it, but it will not do to be too fast in the matter. It is better for her to learn a little at a time, think it over well, and be thoroughly convinced before she commits herself, and when she does at last give in, it will be an entire renouncing of everything."

"I hope so, but I can't help being terribly anxious as to the result," sighed Ada, impatiently.

"I hope so, but I can't help being terribly anxious as to the result," sighed Ada, impatiently.

"I have he doctor's family will try every way to keep her with them. Lady Prescott almost worships her, and it will be almost like burying her to give her up," Miss Therwin said, doubtfully.

to keep her with them. Lady Prescott almost worships her, and it will be almost like burying her to give her up," Miss Therwin said, doubtfully.

"You seem to be in rather a skeptical mood today, Miss Ada," Judith observed, somewhat sarcastically.

"It is because I am so anxious."

"Bah I her is yes when she is in trouble."

"Bah! Hearts don't break so easily as you imagine. Do you need any money, Judith?" And Miss Therwin thus dismissed the subject with the coolest indifference, and turned to affairs of minor importance.

"You may as well leave me a fiver. Persons in my delicate state of health require the most nourishing viands to keep up their strength, you know," Judith returned, with a mocking laugh, as she poured out her third cup of tea, and helped herself to another drumstick.

Miss Therwin took the desired amount from her well-filled purse and passed it to her.

"You must be as saving as you can," she said, "for I am a little short on my allowance this month; though if you succeed in carrying out our plans, I shall not begrudge whatever we may spend."

"It am glad to hear you say that, Miss Ada, for I assure you I do not object to this comfortable way of living." Judith answered, with a satisfied glance around her cozy apartments.

"If everything works well," Ada conti

"Another! I've not made so very much as yet,

"Another! I've not made so very much as yet, that I can see."
"Well, you will, for I shall, of course, pay you the sum I promised, and, besides, Sir Athelstone and Lady Prescott will undoubtedly settle a hand-some annuity upon Sibyl. They will never allow her to want for anything; so there will be no need for you ever to lift your hand again, that is, if you can keep up the deception."

"I think I shall be able to, with such a prospect for the future as you describe. I always did love the comfort which money brings. But about this other chance?"

There was a greedy look on the woman's face, that told that money would tempt her to a great deal.

deal.

"Oh! there is a gentleman in town who has become very much enamored of Sibyl, and after she comes to live with you, if you will only assist him in his suit, your fortune is made."

"What other deep-laid scheme have you in your brain now, Miss Ada?" demanded Judith, with a cunning look at her companion.

"None whatever, only don't you see, if he can win the girl, the coast is clear for me in another direction."

"Sure enough; but will this one be willing to

"Sure enough; but will this one be willing to compromise himself, any more than the other?" was the shrewd inquiry.

Miss Therwin colored.
She knew right well the character of the Duc d'Aubigne.
She knew that he had won many pure hearts, only to break and trample on them. But she answered, carelessly;
"That is his lookout, not mine. I am only concerned to get her well out of young Prescott's way as soon as possible."
"What is his name?"
"I suppose you will have to know it before long, and I may as well tell you. It is the Duc d'Aubigne."

d'Aubigne."
A sudden, noisy clatter startled Miss Therwin at this moment.
In some unaccountable way, Judith had dropped her knife and fork, and tipped her plate into her lap.
She quickly replaced the plate, and then stopped to pick up the other things, which was a work requiring some exertion, since the knife had sped in one direction, and the fork in another.

Her face was very red and her eyes very bright when she resumed her seat, from the recent exertion, probably.
"Does he belong here?" she asked, returning to the subject under discussion; but the tones of her voice were not quite steady, and her color was rapidly receding.

of her voice were not quite steady, and her color was rapidly receding.
"Not he is a relative of Lady Wilton, and visits her every season. He has a magnificent estate in France, besides an unlimited bank account, I am told."
"How do you happen to know so much about him?" Judith asked, with a keen glance.

Store Your Pantry and Cellar with Home-Made Food Products Now to Avoid Shortage next Winter

HE world is starving in consequence of war. In America is the last available food reserve and it must be made adequate to feed our own soldiers and the armies of our allies and their people, too, if we are to win the war. This world conflict is as much a war of women as of men, and the women, as a rule, are doing their part with a zeal and efficiency which should shame such male slackers as neither work nor fight. Thousands of women are doing men's work, filling the places of those who have donned the khaki, while others are angels of mercy to the sick and wounded, and all are helping on the Red Cross work, but the great and all-important woman's war service is that to which all American housewives are called—to fight famine at home so that our soldiers shall not be attacked by starvation while fighting the atrocious Huns.

Production, conservation and transportation constitute the three important elements of the food problem. The shortage of farm labor is a serious handicap to the production of the staple crops though this is expected to be offset in a measure by a larger use of machinery. At best the supply will be scant in proportion to the need and will have to be stretched so far as to involve a degree of sacrifice on the part of our people as yet not generally anticipated. The war gardens will be a great help, especially through the summer and fall; and here is where the women and children will get in their work. But much of the garden produce is perishable, as are the fruits and berries, and will go to waste unless the surplus is preserved by canning or drying for winter use. And here again the women and children will come to the rescue.

All food of every kind produced this season will be needed, and waste of any sort means privation here as well as over there before next summer. It is a military necessity that we increase our exports of wheat, beef and pork to Europe which can be accomplished only by cutting down our home consumption of these articles. That is the Government's program and you can rely on the Food Admistration for a rigid enforcement. Therefore we must prepare for a further substitution of other foods for our use or go on short rations. Let not the slackers who would neglect to can and preserve for home use console themselves with the notion that there will be a plenty of purchasable canned goods in the market, for there will not be. The present stock of canned foods is nearly exhausted and scarcity of tin will reduce this season's factory production, which, coupled with the fact that the Government has engaged for the use of the army and navy half of the entire output of the canning factories, will surely cause an unprecedented scarcity-besides. the increased cost of labor and material will put the prices up still higher for such as is obtainable.

Plenty of Sugar for Home Canning and Preserving

N the interest of conservation the Food Administration has taken entire control of the distribution of sugar which is now sold under to quentity m But a recent Government bulletin urges the people to provide for their own needs as largely as possible by home canning and preserving, and promises an ample supply of sugar for this purpose. But in order to obtain the sugar for canning and preserving you will have to go to your grocer and fill out, sign and leave with him a certificate stating the quantity required by you for this use This certificate system has been adopted to prevent sugar being obtained in unreasonable quantities for household consumption. wait till the last minute before you need it, but call on your grocer at once for a certificate and place your order in due season. If he has no blank certificates get him to send to the Federal Food Administrator, Washington, D. C., who will furnish them free on application.

Don't Eat Up the Freight

TEXT in importance to production and conservation of food is the relief of the strain on our overtaxed transportation facilities. Such enormous quantities of war material. which is given the preference, have to be hauled that the railroads are unable to meet the ordinary transportation requirements of the country. Much freight is refused under Government embargo and there is long delay and great difficulty in obtaining shipment even of such necessaries as food and fuel, in consequence of which the people in some sections of the country came unpleasantly near freezing and starving last winter. Therefore it is imperative that each community manage, so far as possible during the war, to live on its own products instead of obtaining its supplies from distant sources. Thus the exigencies of war are forcing us to revert in some respects to the methods by which our great-grandmothers provisioned their homes before the days of railroads when each home was of necessity a self-sustaining little community producing for itself nearly everything consumed therein. It is our duty to our country, in order not to eat up the freight facilities, as well as for our own interest in the way of economy of cost to live as largely on local produce and use as little of the products of distant sections as possible. We can do this to a great extent by canning, drying or preserving near-by vegetables, fruits and berries. liberal supply of jellies, jams and fruit butters will serve as a wholesome and appetizing substitute for dairy butter on our bread. If your situation permits you will render a patriotic service and benefit yourself by raising your own pork, poultry and eggs.

Slackened production at the coal mines makes a fuel shortage inevitable next winter, and it will be worse than that of last winter unless mining and distribution are speeded up immediately. It behooves all who live where stove wood is obtainable to lay in a supply at once for winter use in place of coal.

"Work or Fight"

ITH the shortage of labor facing the nation as one of the most serious difficulties that obstruct the effective prosecution of the war, public opinion is waking to the fact that idleness under present conditions is a crime, and some States have recently enacted laws to make it punishable in order to compel the loafers to get busy at some useful employment. Judging from the favorable editorial comment on this movement other States are likely to pursue this line of action which should be adopted immediately throughout the country.

New Jersey leads with a law requiring every able-bodied male resident between the ages of eighteen and fifty years to be habitually and regularly engaged in some lawful, useful, and recognized employment until the termination of the war, and Governor Edge in his proclamation calling upon the sheriffs and other peace officers to see that every idling male in the State goes to work or goes to jail, explains that if these idlers say they are unable to find work, the State Labor Department will find it for them. In further comment the Governor says: "The selective service principle should prevail as in the making of our military forces. In this task we are drafting the industrial army." He instructs the State Labor Department to assign to each loafer the kind of work suitable to his mental and physical capacity. The idlers are declared to "constitute not merely a financial burden to every community, but also a genuine menace to the welfare of the nation's manhood under arms and their safety on the bat-tle front. * * * * Our farms and industries need more man-power than is available to meet the extraordinary demands for production. By making this law of 1918 something more than a temporary sensation we shall be helping to supply this demand and at the same time curbing vagrancy, uselessness, mendicancy, immorality and crime."

In the rush to seek employment rather than be caught in the State-wide round-up that began immediately after the Governor's proclamation a thousand idle men in one day applied for jobs at the public Employment Bureau in the City of Newark, alone, which indicates an astonishing prevalence of loafing in a State wherein hundreds of industrial establishments are offering high wages and advertising for help. The comments of newspapers in other States warrant the interference that New Jersey is no exception and that the plague of idleness is far too prevalent throughout the country, in the rural sections as well as in the cities. Maryland and West Virginia have just adopted anti-loafing laws, the New York legislature is considering a similar bill, and the Governor of Georgia is starting a compulsory labor movement in his State. Let the good work go on, for it is a shame for women to be injuring their health doing men's work while these idle drones are loafing.

The work of building the ships so much needed by our Government for carrying supplies to our army in France has been much delayed by numerous strikes among the high wage shipyard mechanics. The papers report that the women of Noank, Conn., on April 23, expressed their indignation at the unpatriotic action of the employees at the local shipbuilding plant in striking. The young men who have quit work are being snubbed by the young women whose cry is "Work or fight." And that should be the slogan throughout the land.

Watch for and Report German Spies

States and there is no abatement of the activity of his spies and secret agents who are spreading destruction by fire and explosives, disease germs and poisons, as well as promoting disloyalty by the circulation of German propaganda. It is a menace of colossal proportions, and to combat it requires that every loyal citizen be on the alert to detect and report all suspicious persons. This is not only a patriotic duty but is required by law, as has been stated in the President's proclamation. The American Defense Society, having a nation-wide organization, has issued the following appeal which we print by request.

"Every German or Austrian in the United States, unless known by years of association to be absolutely loyal, should be treated as a potential spy.

"Be on the alert. Keep your eyes and ears open. Take nothing for granted. Energy and alertness may save the life of your son, your husband or your-brother.

"The enemy is engaged in making war in this country, in transmitting news to Berlin, and in spreading peace propaganda, as well as lies about the conditions and morale of American military forces.

"Whenever any suspicious act, or disloyal word comes to your notice, communicate at once with the Vigilance Corps of the American Defense Society, with the police department, the local office of the Department of Justice, or with the national headquarters of the American Defense Society, 44 East 23rd Street, New York City."

We trust that Comfort readers will heed this appeal and not neglect to perform their part of this important war service to prevent our country from being stabbed in the back while fighting the Huns in France.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Lady Prescott, wife of Sir Athelstone Prescott, and her son Raymond, while traveling by coach, lose their way, and night overtaking them. they stop at a miserable inn, in a little fishing village on Flamborough Head. They are attracted to a little girl, Sibyl, who waits on them. Her winning ways, her admittance of the cruel blows given by Mistress Sloan, and that her own mother would not do it, convince them that the inakeeper is not her father, and they determine to the third woman where the held, who for weeks cries for the child woman where he child, who for weeks cries for Nansie. Mistress Sloan, for the consideration of thirty pounds, consents to let the child go, muttering she will keep her secrets. That night Sibyl is awakened and overhears Jem and his wife talking over the terms of the bargain, and through a chink in the wall she detects the place where an invaluable trinket, belonging to her, is concealed. The next morning she secures "S. H. S.," which she dimly remembers and which convinces Lady Prescott that the gem is Sibyl's, and by it she may be restored to her own people. Five years later, her nineteenth birthday, Lady Prescott introduces her to society. She clasps a beautiful chain, to which is suspended the trinket, around her neck, and with Raymond they seek the drawing-room, where with Lady Prescott Sibyl assists in receiving the guests. Raymond, watching and anxious, admits to his mother how beautiful Sbyl is, and that no one attracts him as she does, and that his mother has the first right to his confidence. She will like Bothling better than to keep her children with her affect of Count Egebach with the children with her affect of the shape of the count of the cou is sick. To further her scheme, Ada Therwin admits to Mrs. Stillman her anxiety to get Sibyl away from Raymond Prescott's company and the opportunity Mrs. Stillman has to make a snug fortune if she will assist one who is enamored with Sibyl. Telling his name, Judith queries why she knows so much about him.

ISS Therwin changed color again. It was evident that Judith's questions were somewhat searching today.

But, with a little, hard, scornful laugh, she returned:

"Oh, I met him in Paris two years ago. He is a great flirt, but seems to be unusually interested in Miss Prescott, and will probably persevere in his attentions as long as there is the least hope of winning her smiles."

"How old is he?"

"How old is he?"

"Really, Judith, you appear quite interested.

"Is—is—has he ever had a wife?"

"No: I should say he is not a marrying man. Still, the charming Sibyl may prove too much for him in this instance," was the sneering reply.

Judith suddenly arose from the table, and, going to the closet, took two or three swallows from a bottle there.

Ada noticed that her face was chalky white; that she breathed with difficulty, and held her hand pressed hard against her left side.

"What is the matter?" she demanded, somewhat alarmed.

THE NECKLACE.

"Mrs. Stillman, I want you to tell me how you and your little girl happened to be on that train going from Scarborough to Bridlington at the time of that accident sixteen years ago, and whether you were traveling alone?"

Sibyl, with a grave, pale face, was in her accustomed seat by the invalid's bedside.

"I do not like to trouble you, dear young lady, with my sorrows, when you are so kind to me."

"Nay, do not refuse me, please, for I have a very particular reason for making the request, Sibyl answered, firmly.

"Very well, then; get into that easy-chair, where you will be comfortable, for it is quite a long story, well, then; get into that easy-chair, where you will be comfortable, for it is quite a long story, well, then; get into that easy-chair, where you will be comfortable, for it is quite a long story, well, then; get into that easy-chair, where well weeks on a farm near the seacoast, only a short distance from Scarborough, in England. My health had been quite poor for several months, awing to excessive grief for a beautiful boy—my willbe, five years old—who died very suddenly of croup. My physician recommended change and the sea; and, taking my little girl, and accompanied by her nurse, I went down there to the sea, as he directed?" interrupted Sibyl, with eagerness, and feeling weak to her fight was faithful as the day is long.

"Yes, her nurse, of whom she was very fond. Her name was Nancy Crawford, but my little girl and her nurse?" interrupted Sibyl, with eagerness, and feeling weak to her fight was faithful as the day is long.

"Yes, her nurse, of whom she was very fond. Her name was Nancy Crawford, but my little girl and her nurse?" interrupted sibyl, with eagerness, and feeling weak to her fight was faithful as the day is long.

"Yes, her nurse, of whom she was very fond there a very valuable necklace, which I wore for safety, not liking to pack it in my lang, and the sea; and, taking my little girl, and a revery and the sea; and, taking my little girl and her nurse "It was composed of a setting of solid gold, having a large diamond in the center, and pearls set thickly around that. My initials were wrought in a gurious manner among the pearls, and that was why I gave my child a name beginning with the same letters—the necklace would descend to her already marked. That clasp probably was wrenched from the necklace during the shock, for I afterward found it gone, and no part of it was ever found, although it was advertised, and the minutest description given of it, and a reward offered for the return of either the whole or a part of it. It may have been, however, that my darling clasped it convulsively in her fear, and retained it on its separating from the necklace. But," continued the woman, with a deep sigh, "if such was the case, it was doubtless clenched in her hand, after she died, and buried with her, poor little dear, in her nameless grave."

"What had become of her?—was she dead—instantly and mercifully put out of misery—or living and maimed for life?

"Every inquiry was made, and a thorough search instituted, but not a trace of either her or the nurse could be discovered, nor a scrap of clothing found, and I was at last compelled to accept the general theory, that they both were among the number of those unclaimed bodies, mangled past recognition.

"No one seemed to remember having seen any one answering to my description of Namie, the nurse, and, strange though it appeared that both should have shared a like fate, yet I was at last obliged to acknowledge that it must be so.

She overheard the innkeeper and his wife talking of a costly jewel which the little one had in her possession when she was brought there, and believing that this would eventually lead to the discovery of her parents, the girl stole into their room the next morning, took it from its hiding-place, and has kept it ever since with the hope ever in her heart that is would some day lead her to her mother.

"Mrs. Stillman, I have that jewel in my possession now. I was that little girl whom Nannie probably saved from that accident, and them went away in her insanity, and left to that desolate life in Flamborough Head: and what you have told me today, together with the production of this necklace, proves to me that I am your child, whom you have so long supposed to be dead, and that you are my—mother!"

ITH the coming of June and vacation time, mothers all over this wide world of ours are confronted with the same problems that our sister, Mrs. Lindsay, is wrestling with—that of teaching children to be neat and orderly (just comfortably neat and orderly) and to take an interest in work at home. It would almost seem that it is the duty of those who have met and overcome these problems to come to the aid of those less fortunate by telling us how you did it, or must we believe, as so many people do, that when it comes to an orderly child, "there ain't no sich animal."—Ed.

DEAR COMPORT SISTERS:

I have thought for a long time that I would write to this good corner but like all the others, I walted until I wanted help. I have been keeping house more than eighteen years and find it some job, too. I tried to have a certain time to do certain things and places for everything and succeeded until my children got large enough to help, then I began to get vexed. The place where they use an article is where they leave it, so I have become very nervous about many things. I have a little son, twelve years old, who lost his left foot when he was seven years old. He gets around splendidly on crutches though he generally wears a test leg. He reminds me of Rip Van Winkle for he is more ready to help other people with their work and chores than to help at home. Now will someone please tell me how to get him more interested in home affairs.

Respectfully, MBS. J. H. LINDSAY.

GEORGIA.

We have been reading Comfort several years and have derived much help and pleasure from it. Our mother has been dead tweive years; she left ten children and all are married now but four. My sister and I have been keeping house for father and two brothers for the last four years but the good Lord saw fit to take Father from us a few weeks ago. It was hard to give him up although we feel that he is much better off than he was here as he suffered severely and was under doctor's care for over three years, We cared for him and did the housework.

Will some of the sisters tell us what we can do to earn our living after this year as the old home will be sold and divided among the heirs. We are poor girls and have very little education. We have always been stay-at-homes and know very little about the ways of the world.

been stay-at-homes and know very little about the ways of the world.

We are five feet, two and one half inches tall. One has light brown hair and blue eyes and the other has dark brown hair and light grey eyes. Lots of folks take us for twins. We are very delicate and weigh from 105 to 111.

We would appreciate any advice the sisters can give us as we are sorely troubled. If anyone should want to write us a personal letter they can get our address from Mrs. Wilkinson.

Two Georgia Sisters.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

When I first began reading COMFORT, several years ago, I noticed a sentence that occurred quite often, which ran like this, "I read COMFORT from cover to cover" and I often wondered if they really did. Pardon me, sisters, for the doubter that I was for I am one of you now and COMFORT is my "favoritest" magazine and I, also, read it from "kiver to kiver."

Right here I want to express my pleasure in the little poem "Today" that headed the Sisters' Corner in the February issue. I had watched for it to "bob up" somewhere for I lost my copy of it while I was memorizing it and was delighted to find it again in our corner. It reminds me of James Whitcomb Riley's work, especially this little verse:

"Taint no use to grumble and complain,
It's just as cheap and easy to rejoice,
When the Lord sends out the weather and sends rain,
Why—rain's my choice."

If we say "rain's my choice" when it does rain, and "ain't it fine today," when it is pleasant, the weather grouchers would be a thing of the past.

I like descriptive letters so will tell you about this little place. This is in the timber region and logging is the chief industry; of course that means mills too, although the mill here was burned four years ago along with most of the little town. We lost three along with most of the little town. is the chief industry; or course that it is along with most of the little town. We lost three stores, two big halls, depot, twenty residences; in fact, everything but a church, that is, on Main Street. But we have a logging camp on every side and the logs are shipped to the mills at Raymond, fifteen miles from here, and the spruce is used by the government for aeroplane stuff. We also have a shippard at Raymond where several hundred men are employed building boats to further the conflict.

Mrs. Rose Humpke Wilkes, if you see this will you write to me?

DEAR MES. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I wonder if we all really appreciate the blessing of being allowed to air our views through this helpful department? What a pleasure it is to get at all sides of so many questions, though I fear we overwork some of them a bit.

As to the city and country question, it is certainly a good thing so many are satisfied with their own location and conditions. We can all be happy, wherever we find ourselves if we put in enough of our time trying to make those around us happy. I know a woman who cried herself sick last Christmas Day because her circumstances were so different from what they once were, although comparatively speaking, she has everything to make life enjoyable. Happiness is comparative anyway and it is often good for us to compare our lot with those around us.

"When we have climbed Life's mountain
And look through a tempest of tears
Back to the simple pleasures
We knew in the by-gone years,
Then we shall know that pleasure
Is only the absence of pain;
Then we shall realize that sunshine
Is only the absence of rain."

I want to ask advice of the sisters. We have a comfortable farm home, out of debt and even own a "fliver" but my husband objects to me giving a dollar to charity. He works very hard and provides well (CONTINUED ON PAGE 7.)

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

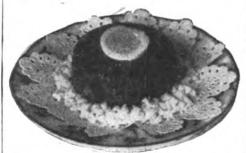

HY buy spring tonics when Nature has provided medicine that is yours for the mere taking, in the guise of greens of various kinds, and the fact that the system craves these, especially in the springtime, should teach us their value.

All greens contain iron, besides other healthful mineral salts, and especially is this true of our common dandelion, though mustard, spinach, beet tops, celery tops and even turnips and nettles, and a great many others, rank equally high. Greens of every kind must be picked over carefully and thoroughly washed by plunging into deep panfuls of cold water and rubbing each leaf to free it from all dirt and any possible insect life, taking care not to break the leaves if they are to be used for a-salad. Unless the bitter flavor of dandelions is liked, it is much better to blanch them, which can be done by tying the leaves in a large piece of thin cloth, or a basket made for that purpose, and placing them in boiling water and letting them boil for seven or eight minutes. Remove, plunge into cold water and drain. Then cook with a generous slice of pork until tender.—Ed.

SALTED DANDELIONS.—Clean and wash dandelions as for cooking, and cover bottom of earthen jar with thick layer of dandelions, wet from washing, then a thick layer of salt and another layer of dandelions and so on till jar is filled. This forms a brine, enough to cover. Cover with plate and heavy weight to keep the dandelions under the brine. Freshen a day before they are to be used, changing the water frequently. They may require more cooking than the fresh plants but otherwise are much the same.

Lady Annesley, stepmether to Sir Thomas and Ravenel Annesley, disapproves of Adrian Gordon, who is in love with Ravenel. Receiving an appointment to India Adrian seals his proposal and Ravenel's promise for an early marriage, by giving an appointment to India Adrian seals his proposal and Ravenel's promise for an early marriage, by giving her a beautiful ring of diamonds and opals. Not daring to wear it she slips it on a ribbon on her neck. Ravenel bid die near the edge of a quarry is heard by Lady Annesley's confidential maid. Four days later Ravenel receives a letter from Adrian that he will go to the Duchess of Avonmore's party and names the following day for their marriage. Lady Annesley, apparently anxious for Ravenel to make a good appearance at the party provides her with a new dress. Ravenel's future husband. Going to the party and not meeting Adrian, Ravenel, with a sob in her throat, wanders through the garden, where she meets Lord Levallion, not knowing it is he. Weary and wanting to go home he offers to take her there. Arriving home she hunts day Ravenal prepares for her weedding and waits for Adrian, who fails to meet her. Going home she enters the drawing-room, where she finds Lady Annesley and Lord Levallion, the latter telling her of his cousin Adrian Gordon's departure for India. The Duchess of Avonmore, to Lord Levallion's delight, takes Ravenal and Sir Thomas to her home. Ravenal is into the Lady Annesley she gives Ravenal the impression that there is a Mrs. Gordon. Believing Adrian false she marries Lord Levallion. Coming from the altar, the groom sees a woman in black with a child clinging to her hand and wonders if Ravenal notices her. Three months later Adrian Gordon is reported missing. Lord Levallion goes to the Vawone as easy adrian Gordon standing before her and she catches the glint of a ring on his hand. Suffering from a shattered arm Lady Levallion catches him as he falls in a faint. He is carried into the SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XXVII. THE EVIDENCE IN THE CASE.

ADY Gwendolen Brook, darkly handsome exquisitely ready, even to her hat, to leave Levallion Castle the first possible instant, took the oath with a fastidious wonder as to where the little crowd of servants had kissed the book.

servants had kissed the book.

It was quite exciting to be a witness; she felt aggrieved that the jury were all "country frumps," who might not appreciate the charming picture she was making as she answered a few innocuous questions. Presently she would give a dramatic recital of Levallion's dreadful, staggering fall as he drank the liqueur his wife had brought him. But the gently spoken coroner suddenly put the drama out of her head.

"Did you go to your room when you left the drawing-room last night after dinner?" he said mildly.

Terror caught Lady Gwendelen by the threat

Terror caught Lady Gwendolen by the throat. Did the man dare to think it was she who had been to Levallion's room to poison him? "No!" she said sharply, angrily. "I went after Lady Levallion, to—to ask if anything was the matter."

"Why did you think anything was the matter—and how far did you go after her?"
The second question made her ready to say anything to clear herself—from what was not in any one's mind but her own.
"I went to the head of the stairs outside her room," she said," and she shut her door as I got there. I stood a minute in an open doorway, and she ran past me in a cloak and hat—as I on the world, "flurriedly."
"Why did you think it? And did you come down then? Did any one see what you did, or where you went?"
Lady Gwendolen glaneed wildly around the room as if for some one who might prompt her. It was a stair of the stand. But Jimmy had the last remnant of self-control left her. She caught Houghton's hard blue eyes, and her last remnant of self-control left her. "No, nobody!" she cried. "But i? you think I went to Lord Levalilion's dressing-room, I can show you I didn't. I went after Lady Levallion for fun, and to see if I could find out what her little game was. She dropped a card—a torn card—at breakfast time, and I picked it up and gave it for fun to Levallion. It had on it, "I'll come back tonight. Meet me,' and I knew there was some lark on. I had almost forgotten it, when Lady Levallion got a note in the drawing-room after dinner. She was standing beside me, and she crumpled it all up in a hurry. She said to herself quite loud, 'I'll have to go,' and she flew out of the room."

"Everything!" She was what Lacy called "utterly rattled" and frightened. "I thought would be on Levallion was going to slip out and meet "would be on Levallion was going to slip out and meet "her was a stey did, I ran back to the drawing-room as they did, I ran back to the drawing-room as they did, I ran back to the drawing-room as they did, I ran back to the drawing-room as they did, I ran back to the drawing-room as they did, I ran back to the drawing-room as they did, I ran back to the drawing-room as they did, on the lady Levallion is face as she clung to the dead man. The coroner's voice steadled him to clear attention.

"How do you k

there."
"How do you know he was listening?"
"Because I heard some one behind me where I was sitting, and I knew it was not Captain Gordon and Lady Levallion, who were just in front of us. I looked through the flowers and saw Levallion. He must have heard every word they said. We did!"
"Who do you meen by we?"

saw Levallion. He must have heard every word they said. We did!"

"Who do you mean by we?"

"Colonel Scarsdale," crossly. "He heard, too. He can say what he likes, but he did!" for Jimmy would have to back her up now. This man meant to know just why she had taken enough interest in Lady Levallion's doings to follow her. Otherwise she could not prove by any earthly means that it was not she who had been prowling round Levallion's dressing-room.

"Colonel Scarsdale will answer for himself," slowly. "For just a few moments more I must trouble you, Lady Gwendolen, Were you in the conservatory by accident, or a thirst for amusement?"

conservatory by accident, or a thirst for amusement?"

"Accident—I don't know," she stammered.
"Lady Levallion and Captain Gordon had left the room where we were dancing, and they were gone for such ages that they kept us waiting for supper. I went partly to get cool, and partly to see if they were there."

"And stayed to listen to their conversation?"

"I couldn't get out," angrily. "You don't understand! They were on one side of me, and Levallion was standing still on the other. I could hear his heart beat and his shirt-front creak. I couldn't go past him or his wife."

"Did what you heard repay you for your forced stay?"

"It was just the tail end of a silly flirtation," viciously, "if that is what you mean! Rubbish about her having to forget, and not being able to get rid of Levallion to please him. And something about sending Captain Gordon back a ring."

"You were sufficiently interested to listen."

Lady Gwendolen shrugged her shoulders.
"It was interesting enough," she said. "He said that in old times he would have—" She stopped, her very blood seemed to stop in her; her callous heart to turn over with horror. If she told what Gordon said, and it was true, she was putting a rope round his neck. The thought made even Gwendolen Brook sick.

"He would have what?"
"I won't tell you!" she gasped.
"I am afraid you have no choice," said the coroner quietly; and the jury whispered together.
"He said in old times"—it was like dragging out every reluctant word—"he would have poisoned Levallion, but now he could only go away. I know he didn't mean it!" wretchedly; "It was just flirtation."

"Flirtation is apparently an elastic word," Doctor Aston said dryly. "Is that all?"

Lady Gwendolen had vices in plenty, but her blood and breeding went against lying. She thought of her oath, of the Bible she had kissed, of—and this went home—how useless it would be to perjure herself when Jimmy Scarsdale might certainly give her away.
"I forgot," she gasped. But the coroner had seen her stop another sentence on her tongue.
"I am very sorry, you naturally hesitate," he said—and even Houghton was not sure whether he was earnest or sarcastic—"but I must have the whole, if you please."

"Well, then, he said would she marry him if Levallion died!" defiantly. "It meant nothing. I know a woman who gave a man a note about the same thing. I, so and so, promise that on the death of my husband I will marry you, so and so, within a year.' But, of course, she didn't do-dt!"

The jury gasped. They were not smart, but estimable county magnates who were not accustomed to playing with the Ten Commandments.

Lady Gwendolen misunderstood the gasp, and rushed furthe to meet Captain Gordon that I went up-stairs after her."

"Why did you think she had gone to meet him? He had gone to London."

"Because the card said, 'I'll come back tonight' and 'meet me'; it was signed A. G. What else could I think? But it was all silly nonsense. You can't think any of it had to do with—"
But she did not finish the sentence. Vain, heartless, empty-headed woman that she was, Gwendolen Brook saw suddenly what her foolish evidence had done. She had made a fool of herself, had brought Jimmy Scarsdale and herself into a nice mess—and Jimmy would half-kill her. Of the anything-but-nice mess in which she had involved her hostess, she would not think. She began to cry from terror and humiliation.

Monsieur Carrousel moved quietly forward from among the servants, and handed pretty, foolish Lady Gwendolen Brook a chair.

Colonel Scarsdale came in stolidly, and when he saw Gwendolen's face hidden in her ring-laden hands was stolid no longer.

"She made an ass of herself!" he thought swiftly, and wondered what the devil he was to do.

He pulled at his mustache as the questions to do.

He pulled at his mustache as the questions began; he had no wish to be mixed up in the thing, but, on the other hand, if Lady Levallion had poisoned her husband—as he honestly thought she had—she could clear herself. Downright lies, too, would be no use if Gwendolen had told all she thought; which was probable, since she would not look at him.

"Will you be good enough to tell us what you heard one evening in the conservatory?" said the coroner blandly, and Scarsdale made up his mind.

"There were so many evenings in the con-ervatory," he said slowly, "I don't remember

"There were so many evenings in the conservatory," he said slowly, "I don't remember any particular one."

Lady Gwendolen's hands dropped from her face. Was Jimmy going to fail her?

"On this particular evening you had danced. You went into the conservatory to wait for supper. Did you hear any conversation, or know that any one was there?"

"I heard a couple of people talking. I didn't listen."

"How near were they?"
"I couldn't tell you. It was not very light."
"Did you, on your oath, recognize the voices?"
"I couldn't swear to them. One man's voice is very like another's when he whispers."

"Did you know the woman's voice?"

"I thought at the time it was Lady Levallion, but I supposed she had a right to be in her own conservatory."

"In fact, you recognized her voice?"

"I may have imagined it."

"Did you hear what the man said to her?"

"I heard the usual conservatory love-making," calmly. "I couldn't repeat any of it."

"Yet the lady with you heard distinctly!"

"Women have quicker ears," hastily.
"Did you hear anything said about what might be done if Lord Levallion died?"

"Yes," said Scarsdale slowly. "But a man in love is no more accountable than one in drink."

"No! She whispered something, if it were she."

"Was there any one else in the conservatory, to your knowledge?"
"There was some one behind us. I don't know

"There was some one behind us. I don't know who it was."

"Was it Lord Levallion?"

"I couldn't say," sensibly, "I certainly did not either see him or hear him speak. I knew there was some one, but it might have been two people, for all I know. Levallion was in the picture-gallery with the others when I got back. They were just going down to supper."

"No! She was standing just inside the dining-room door when we went down to supper. She was alone."

"Is that all you can recall of the evening?"

"I think so. There was nothing to stamp it on my mind. Sir Thomas Annesley's dog ate some soup and was sick," insolently. "I saw that at supper."

"Who gave him the soup?"

"Levallion. No one else took any," slowly, struck for the first time with the thought that there might have been a reason for Mr. Jacobs indisposition.

struck for the first time with the thought that there might have been a reason for Mr. Jacobs' indisposition.

"Did you, from that evening, see any cause to take an interest in the movements of Lady Levallion and Captain Gordon?"

"I suppose we all laughed a little at Levallion letting them fiirt under his nose. But they scarcely spoke to each other in public afterward."

"In that case, then, it was common talk that he overheard them in the greenhouse?"

"People talk of anything in the country."

But his half-truths had done more harm than good, except to get him out of any further connection with the distasteful business. A juror whispered something to the coroner; and Sir Thomas Annesley was called.

The boy's brown face was thin and haggard. He had no thought of where suspicion might go, but he had an honest misery in him because Levallion lay dead up-stairs. There was a moment's diversion as Mr. Jacobs, who came in with him, growled and bristled so fiercely that he had to be removed.

"It's Carrouse! The dog hates him," said Sir Thomas angrily, as some one said something about a "vicious brute." "The dog is as kind as milk."

"Why does he hate unoffending people, then?" inquired the coroner, who detested dogs.

"What do you mean about your dog being poisoned?"
"I mean Levallion did not eat his soup one night at supper and gave it to Jacobs," grimly. "The dog was sick, and I worked over him all ight. The vet, said it was prussic acid, and I thought he might have eaten meat poisoned for poachers' dogs, but I don't think so now. I think is twas the soup that Levallion didn't taste."

Carrousel turned livid with fury.

It was not poisoned in my kitchen, then!" he shouted. "Ask who was in the dining-room before the other guests, first!"
"Another word and you leave the room," said Aston quietly. "Sir Thomas, are you convinced that poisoned soup was meant for Lord Levallion?" "Since he was poisoned last night, I am," grimly. "It was a twenty-to-one chance against his giving it to my dog. Levallion had soup every night."

"Who do you think poisoned it?" bluntly.
"I don't know. But I do know that there was a strange woman hanging round outside the house that night, for Levallion and I both saw her. He was angry because she was spying in the greenhouse, and he went there to try and pounce on her. I think he knew who she was."
"Do you mean she could have got in and put possible."

"Not when you know that they were having a sort of masquerade in the house!" valiantly. "All the women were wearing black masks and had their heads tied up in black rags. Any one (continued on page 12.)

for the family, and buys books, magazines, sheet music, and records for the graphophone but he insists that the poor, orphans, etc., should be provided for by the state and as we are tax payers he says we have done our share. I do not see it that way but think we should help individually whenever we can. Now should I give openly and displease him or give secretly when he does not know it or let him have his way and not give at all? I work as hard as my strength allows and feel as though the sacrifice is as much mine as his. Mrs. V. M. has received some excellent advice. I wonder if she ever thought about love being comparative, as well as happiness. Of course there is no man so attractive but we might some day meet one who would outclass him but just because this is so we haven't any right to leave the one we have fuarried. When I hear a woman boasting about 'bossing' her husband I feel sorry for her showing such poor judgment in selecting one that needed bossing. If we, like V. M., made a poor selection, or what we think is one, let's not let anyone know it.

Let me shake hands with Mrs. Poag. If there is anything I enjoy it is a Sunday School and no one should ever get too old to attend and help. We have what we call a Bible study class in our own home for the people of the neighborhood as we are not in reach of any other "meeting" during the winter months.

I hope "COMPORT" Sister and Reader" will find that little child somewhere. So many childless homes and homeless children would both be blessed if they were brought together.

Now sisters, help me with my problem.

DEAR COMFORT READERS:
Like a great many others I am coming to COMFORT

Like a great many others I am coming to Comfort for help.

John and I are dreaming great dreams of a little home we are going to build and of course we want it to be the dearest little home in the world. I know so many of the readers of Comfort have such lovely homes that I am hoping they will tell me about them. Will someone having a small house, costing around two thousand dollars, tell us of the floor plan and how each room is furnished. I don't know much about harmonizing but am anxious to learn.

The sisters are discussing the farm and the city so may I add just a word or two? I have always lived in a little country town and have taught school for eight years in the rural districts and there is a charm for me in the country that I do not find elsewhere, but the advantages to be had in the city are enough to justify one's living there. As for the girls, I agree with Mary Farmer, they can be what they wish to be anywhere.

Will someone tell me the proper way to wash clothes.

with Mary Farmer, they can be what they wish to be anywhere.

Will someone tell me the proper way to wash clothes. Should they be washed through two waters before boiling and should the water in which they are boiled be boiling or cold when the clothes are put in? I know some of you are smiling at my questions but please do not for I am not altogether a little ignoramus. I just never had any mother to teach me.

COMPORT sisters, I love you every one and wish I could know you personally and I wish you and our Mrs. Wilkinson success.

BRANDENBURG, KY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL THE COMPORT SISTERS:

I like to read the letters that tell of working to pay for a home for that is what we are trying to do now and of course we are finding it somewhat hard as everything is so high and we have four little ones to feed and clothe. We are planning to build in the near future and I wish the sisters would give me their ideas on how to turnish my sitting-room so it will be pretty and pleasant without being what I call stuffy, as I have to spend a great deal of my time there. I am a partial shut-in from ulcerated stomach and would be glad if the sisters would send me old papers and books to read. I will return the favor if possible.

With love to all,

MRS. Sadesia. M. M. MRS. JAMES E. SEDORIS.

Mrs. Sedoris.—If I didn't feel sure that you would get better ideas from the sisters on home furnishing than I could give you, I'd gladly tell you what little I know about the subject, but from the pen glimpses I have had of so many homes, both inside and out, I think it would be better to wait .- Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I wonder if there are any other sisters who have experienced what I am now going through. Before my marriage and even in the beginning of it, I was called "Busy Celia" and "Old Grandmother." because I could not be idle for one moment, and now I ought to be called lazy. I do not want to be but I am. I have been known to sit for a full hour doing nothing, not even reading. I have a good husband and I love him and our little son better than my life but even that does not make me happy. Husband thinks I am not well and that I need rest but I feel well, although I do not weigh as much as I did, and I do have headaches. Others say it is baby for he weighs 22 pounds and is only six months old and the wildest child I have ever seen for that age. He is the only grandchild on both sides of the family and is very much spoiled, which makes more work for me to do, if it can be called that. As I am writing this he is pulling on the lace on the table cover and if I do not take him away there will be a collision in which he or the glass vase will be the sufferer.

I love my little home, although it is only a fiveroom flat, and I have fixed and fussed with it until Hubby said it was "just grand," but there my in-

RE you planning to dry, can, or otherwise preserve a large supply of fruits, vegetables, and wild meat and chicken, as a part of your food conservation program this summer? Do you realize that when we entered the war, the men of all the nations holding Germany at bay had been called from the farms and were in the trenches, and that the fields were plowed and sowed by the women who worked from dawn till dark in their desperate fight against famine? But their sacrifice will be in vain unless supplemented by the devoted service of the women over here.

mented by the devoted service of the women over here.

And so our country calls the women of America to stand guard over the world's commissary, which is the food supply of America. It is scant and promises but a short allowance at best. So you will guard it as precious, keeping the grim truth always before you, that all the blood, all the heroism, all the money and munitions will not win this war for us unless our soldiers and the armies of our allies and the people behind them, are fed.

Make it your war service to use all the perishable foods possible during the summer months, and to lay by a store for winter consumption. Improved methods of home canning and drying are no longer in the experimental stage, and there are now on the market several kinds of home canning outfits, appliances and apparatus, also evaporating outfits and appliances which are made in several sizes with prices varying accordingly, and are very helpful in any home where any considerable canning or dry-preserving is done, as they lessen the amount of labor, enable one to increase the output and produce more reliable and satisfactory results than can generally be obtained with ordinary kitchen utensils. 'Dehydrated' simply means dried or evaporated, or in other words preserved by drying by a mechanical process by which nothing but water is taken from the fruit or other article and without lajury to the cell structure, so that upon soaking in water when required for use, the dried product is restored with full flavor and nutriment.

False Economy of Ledving Out Sugar is not only a patriotic act, but will insure the family a supply of meat during the shortage and high prices of another winter. Duck, grouse, partridge, pheasant, gray squirrel, hares, rabbits and venison, are fine eating and in most localities where they abound may be taken and canned during the open season. To attain the highest quality or flavor, game should be bled as soon as shot, and dressed as soon as possible. Ptomaine poisoning occurs when meat is improperly handled

The handling and cooking of birds applies to other meats. Freshness and clean handling forming the first elements of success and wholesomeness.

Home Canning and Preserving Methods

Home Canning and Preserving Methods

In the preservation of food by canning, preserving, etc., the most essential things in the processes are the sterilization of the food and all the utensils and the sealing of the sterilized food to exclude all germs.

In preserving, canning and jelly makings from or tin utensils should never be used. The fruit acids attack these metals and so give a bad color and metallic taste to the products. The preserving kettles should be porcelain lined, enameled or of a metal that will not form troublesome combinations with fruit juices. Kettles should be broad, rather than deep as the fruit should not be cooked in deep layers.

If canning is done by the oven process, a large sheet of asbestos, for the bottom of the oven, will prevent the cracking of jars.

The wooden rack, on which the bottles rest in the washboiler, is made in this manner: Have two strips of wood measuring one inch thick, one inch wide, and two inches shorter than the length of the boiler. On these pieces of wood tack thin cross-strips of wood that are one and one half inches shorter than the width of the boiler. These cross-strips should be about one inch wide and spaced about an inch apart. This rack will support the jars and will admit the free circulation of boiling water about them. Young willow branches, woven into a mat, also make a good bed for bottles and jars.

The wire basket is a saver of time and strength. The fruit to be peeled is put into the basket, which is lowered into a deep kettle partially filled with boiling water. After a few minutes the basket is lifted from the boiling water, plunged for a moment into cold water, and the fruit is ready to have the skin drawn off.

A fruit pricker is easily made and saves time. Cut a piece half an inch thick from a broad cork: press through this a dozen or more coarse

The selection of fruit is one of the first steps in obtaining successful results. The flavor of fruit is not developed until it is fully ripe, but unless fruit can be obtained in perfect condition, a little under-ripe is preferable to over-ripe, especially in jelly making, as in over-ripe fruit the pectin begins to lose its jelly-making quality. Where syrup is to be used, have it ready before commencing to prepare the fruit. Wash hard fruits before paring. Wash berries before stemming or hulling by putting a small quantity into a colander pouring cold water over them and draining on a sieve. Do this quickly, as berries absorb water.

PRESERVED STRAWBLERIES—Use equal weights of sugar and strawberries. Put the berries in the pre serving kettle in layers, sprinkle sugar over each layer.
The fruit and sugar should not be more than four inches deep. Place the kettle on the stove and beat the fruit and sugar slowly to the boiling point. When it begins to boil, skim carefully. Boil ten minutes, counting from the time the fruit begins to bubble.
Pour the cooked fruit into platters, having it about two or three inches deep. Place the platters in a sunny window, in an unused room, for three or four days. In that time the fruit will grow plump and firm, and the syrup will thicken simost to a jelly.
Put this preserve, cold, into jars or tumblers.

CANNAR PRECHES.—Pour three oversts of hot water.

Put this preserve, cold, into jars or tumblers.

CANNED PERCHES —Pour three quarts of hot water over one quart of sugar and stir until dissolved. Skim the syrup when it boils and then draw back where it will just keep hot without boiling. Pare peaches, cut in halves and remove stones. Put a layer of peaches with two or three of the peach stones into a preserving kettle and cover with some of the hot syrup. When the fruit begins to boil, skim carefully Boil gently for ten minutes, then put in the jars and seal. If the fruit is not fully ripe, it may require a little longer time to cook. While this is cooking the fruit for the next batch may be pared. Put in cans and seal.

Now add the remaining ten quarts of berries and heat slowly. Boil ten minutes, counting from the time they begin to bubble. Put in cans and seal as directed.

EARLY APPLES.—The early apples make fine apple sauce for winter use, especially the varieties that are juicy and cook up quickly. Wash the apples, cut into slices without paring or coring. Cook quickly, put through wire sieve, return to preserving kettle and sweeten to taste and bring to boil. Put into cans and seal as directed.

CHERRIES.—Three pints of sugar to one half pint of water and six quarts of cherries. Measure the cherries after the stems have been removed; stone them or not. Put the sugar and water in the preserving kettle and stir over the fire until the sugar is dissolved. Put in the cherries and heat slowly to the boiling point. Boil ten minutes, skimming carefully. Put in cans and seal.

Preserving Eggs for Winter Use

Preserving Eggs for Winter Use

Through May and June the egg production will exceed the consumption, and it is then that the wise housewife will preserve or "lay-down" her eggs for winter use, when not only are good eggs scarce, but the price almost prohibitive. The "water-glass" method of preserving eggs is the most common and satisfactory. Water glass, or sodium silicate, is a syrupy liquid which can be purchased at drug stores and it is also frequently found at groceries.

To prepare water glass, mix one gallon of this with nine gallons of water which has been previously boiled. This solution should be placed in some container, such as a stone crock or jar. The eggs can then be put in the solution and used when desired. They should be stored in a room which is cool and in which the air is fresh and sweet. The jar should be covered to keep the solution clean, and inspected occasionally to see that evaporation has not exposed the eggs.

In selecting eggs, too great care cannot be exercised. Only clean, unwashed, fresh, strong-shelled eggs should be used. Infertile eggs are better than those from a flock where male birds are present. If possible, the eggs should be stored the day they are laid. One gallon of water glass will make enough solution for fifty dozen eggs.

According to the latest statistics, there are at present in the Philippine Islands 102 private schools giving primary education; 67 intermediate; 37 secondary, 14 colleges. The enrollment for the past year was as follows: Primary, 15,758; intermediate, 4,551; secondary, 2,989, and collegiate, 842. There are in the schools 66 American instructors, 394 European, and 648 Filipino.

Sibyl's Influence

burst of tears, Sibyl sank upon her knees at the bedside, sobbing and trembling in a way that really terrified the hardened creature that was watching her every movement so closely.

CHAPTER XX.

A NEW FEAR.

Judith had passed a strangely checkered life, and it will be best, perhaps, to take a glance at it now before going on further with our story. She was the foster-sister of Ada Therwin's mother, whose maiden name was Anna Ashleigh, and having been a remarkably bright and attractive looking child, she had, after her own mother's death, been kindly cared for by Anna's parents, and allowed to share many of her advantages; consequently she had acquired quite a good education and some accomplishments. But from her earliest childhood she had betrayed a tricky, selfish nature, that made her exceedingly disagreeable to all around her; and in the days of her girlhood she went by the name of "Judith the Crafty" among her mates. She had seen something of the good and pleasant side of life, but very much more of the evil, while her inordinate love of money, and of the fine things it procured, led her into many a sin. Judith had passed a strangely checkered life evil, while her inordinate love of money, and of the fine things it procured, led her into many a sin.

At the age of seventeen, becoming intolerant of control, she left the home where she had been so kindly cared for, and for years no one heard from or knew anything of her.

Then she returned as suddenly as she had gone away, bringing two lovely children with her—a boy and a girl.

She refused to give any account of her past life, except to say that she was married, her husband traveling, and she had come back to live near her old home until his return.

She called herself Mrs. Aubrey, and seemed to have plenty of money for a comfortable support, and was devotedly attached to her children, who were certainly very bright and beautiful, and seemed to belong to a higher order of humanity than herself.

Not long after her return to her native village, an epidemic broke out, and both children suddenly sickened and died.

The poor mother was heartbroken for a while, and fears were entertained that she would lose her mind, and at length she disappeared again, and was not heard from for several years more.

But after Mrs. Therwin's marriage, and the birth of Ada, she came back once more, in a most forlorn condition, and begged for a home in her family.

This was kindly granted to her, and Mrs. Therwin's health being delicate, the care of Ada fell to her, and she soon grew to love the child devotedly, and seemed to spend the affection on her which she would have given to her own children had they lived.

She remained with Mrs. Therwin until her death, and then Ada being adopted by the Countess of Shirley, she was left to shift for herself once more.

Her life from that time was of rather a susticious nature: and once she had come secretly

Her life from that time was of rather a suspicious nature; and once she had come secretly and in great despair to Ada, begging for help. She had stolen a large sum of money, and nothing but immediate repayment would save her ing but immediate repayment would save her from a long imprisonment.

Ada confided the fact to the countess, and obtained the money; but Judith was from that moment forbidden to hold any further communication with her former charge.

But Miss Therwin shrewdly turned the affair to good account for herself; henceforth she would have a strong hold upon her, and having discovered some other things of a very suspicious nature about her previous life she used them to intimidate her, and made her a cats-paw to perform many mean little services and intrigues in which she was engaged.

She paid her well, and Judith having no other means of support, eagerly availed herself of this opportunity.

means of support, eagerly availed herself of this opportunity.

Bad as the woman was, and had been all her life, she instinctively shrank appalled at the magnitude and wickedness of this last plot which Ada required her assistance and co-operation to accomplish. It was horrible, cruel, and malicious in its every detail, and more than once under the spell of Sibyl's loveliness and gentleness, her heart had nearly failed her. But the promised reward was large, and Judith longed to spend the remainder of her health in comfort, especially as her health, from an incipient heart trouble, was really threatening to fail.

But today, as Sibyl knelt solbing by her bedside, and she realized all that she was doing, and all that she would yet have to do, in order to crush her young life, she really grew frightened at the result, which, together with the excitement of working herself up to a state of emotion necessary to make her acting appear real, brought on a severe attack of palpitation of the heart.

But this only served to make the scene more cal to the young girl. She became very white, nd panted so for breath, that the bed shook eneath her.

real to the young girl. She became very white, and panted so for breath, that the bed shook beneath her.

Sibyl was startled out of her own emotion, and, believing that she had been too sudden in revealing her identity, she became very much alarmed at her mother's condition.

"Give me some water," gasped the suffering woman, and Sibyl flew to obey; but it was not until after she had taken other restoratives, which she directed the young girl to bring her, that she obtained relief.

"Sibyl—my little Sibyl! I cannot make it seem true—I can scarcely believe it. Darling, my heart is too full for words; and yet—and yet—are you sure it is all true? It would be too cruel to deceive me now," she said at last. For answer, Sibyl took from her neck the chain which Lady Prescott had so tenderly clasped around it, on her last birthday, and laid it, with its glittering ornament, in her companion's hand. With an eager cry of delight, Mrs. Stillman seized it.

seized it.

"It is the same—the very same," she whispered. "and there can be no doubt. My child!"

She held out her arms, and Sibyl, too excited to realize what she was doing, dropped her head against the woman's breast, and sobbed afresh. "Bless you, darling!" said Mrs. Stillman, tenderly. "Can you learn to love me a little after all these years?"

"Oh mother it is all so new and strange."

"Oh, mother, it is all so new and strange, I cannot realize it!" cried Sibyl, wildly.

"You will in time, dear," returned the other, softly stroking her silken hair.

"I have prayed for years to find my mother," the excited girl went on. "I have cherished her image in my heart, and longed with unutterable longing to find her."

When Sibyl spoke of "cherishing her mother's image in her heart," a startled look had come into the woman's eyes.

"Do you trace any familiar lines in my face, dear?" she asked, with secret anxiety.
Sibyl shook her head sadly.

"No—I was so young, you know, and yet, many times in my dreams, and sometimes area."

Sibyl shook her head sadly.

"No—I was so young, you know, and yet, many times in my dreams, and sometimes even during my waking hours, I have seemed to see a face which I believed must be my mother's."

"It was not like mine, then, dear?"

"No: but doubtless you have changed much since that dreadful day, when you thought you had lost me forever."

"Yes, yes," replied Mrs. Stillman, with a peculiar look and a deep-drawn sigh.

"My darling," Mrs. Stillman said at length, reaching out and taking her hand, "do you know that in the midst of my great joy at finding you, "And why?"

Our Flag Its Famous Story-Marks of Respect Due "Old Glory"

The first model of the flag was made by Mrs. Betsey Ross, of Philadelphia, at the request of General Washington and a Congressional Committee. At Mrs. Ross' suggestion, five-pointed ones, which had been proposed. The original Stars and Stripes consisted of thirteen stripes, alternate red and white, to represent the thirteen original states; and thirteen stars, one for each state. The red denotes valor; the white, loope, truth and purity; and the blue, justice, loyalty and sincerity.

The Stars and Stripes were first raised in battle on August 30th, 1777, by New York soldiers, over Fort Stanwix. A British attack was expected, and the garrison was without a flag, but hurriedly made one by cutting up and stitching together white ammunition shirts, a captain's blue cloak, and a red petticoat belonging to a soldier's wife.

On July 4th or July 12th, 1777—the date is not certain—Commodore John Paul Jones hoisted the Stars and Stripes on his vessel, the U. S. frigate Ranger, which set sail in November, and on his arrival in France, Jones requested and received from the French fleet the honor of a salute of nine guns for his flag—the first salute received by the American flag from a foreign nation. On the 24th of April, Jones compelled a British warship to "strike her colors" in token of surrender to the Stars and Stripes. On January 28th, 1778, American troops captured Fort Nassau, in the Bahamas, from the British, and raised the Stars and Stripes. On January 18th, 1784, the flag was first displayed in China. Im August, 1790, it completed its first journey around the world, having accompanied the vessel "Columbia" from Boston. On January 13th, 1794, an Act of Congress was passed, adding two more stripes and stars to the flag, one each for Kentucky and Vermont, which had entered the Union. On April 4th, 1818, another act was passed, decreeing that the number of stripes should be reduced from fifteen to the original thirteen, and that for every new state that entered the Union, another star should

In war time they should be observed with especial care by our people as a public expression of their love of country and devotion to its cause; for which reason it is necessary that the prescribed formalities should be universally known. "Mother!" interrupted Sibyl, in surprise.

"But, dear, your life is so different from mine—you have been brought up to have every luxury, you have known no care, no sorrow, no pain you cannot labor, and I have nothing for your support—no, not even enough for my own," was the bitter reply.

"But there will be some way provided. My duty is with you hereafter," Sibyl answered, but with a very white face.

"Mother," she said, and the tones, though low, were clear and steady. "I cannot deny that there are many things which it will be very trying at first for me to relinquish. I have had every luxury, as you say, and I have been cared for in the tenderest manner. But my duty is, as I said before, with you. I shall come to you at once, and try to see if I cannot make life a little brighter for you in the future. Have you suffered very much? Have you been alone in the world so very long?" Sibyl concluded, with wistful sympathy.

"Yes, many years, and I have suffered very much; but I will tell you more of that another time," was the somewhat moody answers to her questions.

"Ah, how selfish I am," Sibyl said, reproach.

"Ah, how selfish I am," Sibyl said, reproachfully, "to give even a thought to what I must leave, when you have endured so much, and perhaps been deprived of even the necessaries of life! How thankful I ought to be—yes, and am"—the shadow lifting a trifle from her face, and a beautiful spirit of self-forgetfulness taking possession of her—"that even at this late day God has sent me to be a comfort to you!"

"You are a dear child," Mrs. Stillman said, regarding her with secret wonder, "but I cannot bear to take you away from all your joys; and they, I know, will not be willing to part with you. It will be better for you in every way to remain where you are, and you can come to me, perhaps for a while every day, as you do now, though I know I shall long for you every minute while you are away."

"God!" cried the woman, thrown off her guard for the moment at that name: "there is no God."
"Mother!" cried the startled girl, aghast.
"You need not be so shocked," she returned, more gently, yet with great bitterness; "my lot in life has not been so favored that I have any reason to attribute it to the care of a kind Providence."

Sibyl thought best not to pursue the subject further then, so she said, gently:

"Girl—girl! the less you question me about him the better for your own peace of mind as well as mine. Ah, this is wretched business!" and she fell back upon her pillow, muttering flercely to herself.

Sibyl was amazed at this outbreak, and a new terror took possession of her heart.

But she saw that Mrs. Stillman was very much excited, and, after speaking a few soothing words, she left her to herself and retired to the other room, hoping that after she had slept she would be more calm, and be willing to unburden her heart to her.

Left to herself, Mrs. Stillman turned her face to the wall.

But it was a fierce, savage-looking face, marred and distorted by bitter pain, anger and shame. A perfect war of hate was raging within her. It seemed as if all the bitterness and evil passions of a lifetime had been aroused by those two innocently spoken words, "your husband;" and she lay, not quietly sleeping, as Sibyl desired, but muttering to herself in wild and incoherent whisperings.

Sibyl knew, by an occasional movement, that she was not asleep, and at the end of an hour she returned to her bedside.

Her manner was very quiet and restrained, and, though she instinctively shrunk from the sullen look which Mrs. Stillman turned upon her, she spoke very gently and sweetly, but firmly:

"Child, you don't know what you are trivial about when you ask me to tell you regarding all my past life," she said, in ferce, low tones. Sibyl's sweet lips were drawn into a tight line of pain, and her eyes shadowed with a look of dread, but she only said, with pitying gentleness:

"Ah! you must have suffered very much!"
"Suffered!" with a bitter laugh; "that is me name for what has come into my life."
"Poor mother!" and no thought of sin came into the pure girl's mind in connection with her, as she tried to take her hand and longed to confort the confort her.

But the woman snatched it quickly away, and tried out, with pained impatience:
"I'm not fit that you should call me mother? I wish you never would speak the word to me again, nor even touch me."
"Surely, you cannot mean what you my. "My do you speak thus?" asked Sibyl, deeply pained.
"Because your lips and hands are pure—mine are polluted. You have neither sinned nor done a wrong act—I am blackened with guilt!" was the reckless answer.

"What do you mean?" came from the year of the part of the pringing up the past, I have something to tell you that will make you shrink from me in horror and loathing—that will make you wish you had been killed during that fatal accident, rather than to have lived to have seen this day."

"No! no! do not tell me that!" she cried.

a gesture of passionate pleading.

"No! no! do not tell me that!" ahe cried, with a moan.

But she calmed herself with a cried, with a moan.

But she calmed herself with a cried, with a moan.

But she calmed herself with a cried, with a moan.

Crushed she might be, but she would fall facing her enemy; and when next she spoke, it was calmly, firmly, even authoritatively.

"Mother—for, since you are my mother, it is proper I should address you as such—you have already told me enough to make me miserable all my life; to leave it thus, this horrible unsertainty, this dread fear, would kill me in a little while. I must know all you have to tell; I must insist that you reveal to me everything; connected with your past. Who was my father? What became of your husband? Is he living or dead, and why, if you once lived in affluence, do I now find you thus?"

Those two words, "your husband," seemed to enrage the woman beyond endurance.

She started to a sitting posture, her whole frame shaking with anger, her face hottest scarlet, her eyes blazing with fury.

"Never dare speak that word to me again while you and I bear company, do you hear?" she cried, hoarsely; "never! it arouses a very devil within me, for—girl, I never had a husband!"

As if impelled by a galvanic battery, Sibyl sprang from her chair, and confronted her companion with a gaze, the like of which she had never seen in her life before upon human face; it seemed to freeze her very blood; it stopped the words upon her lips, and deprived her of the power to move.

the power to move.

For one moment only, though it seemed an age to that wretched woman, she stood looking down upon her without motion or breath: then, with a wild cry, which rang in her ears as long as she lived, Sibyl sank, without sign or warning, in a senseless heap upon the floor.

With one spring, Mrs. Stillman alighted be side her.

"This is a fine piece of business," she was tered, gloomily, as she pulled a pillow from the bed, and laid the beautiful face upon it: "a pretty mess you are compelling me to make of it, Miss Ada Therwin—bah! I wouldn't have believed that she'd have felt it like this. It's too bad to kill her so by inches, for kill her I believe it will in the end. The sensitive, high minded thing's heart refuses to own me as her mother, but her fine sense of duty and honor makes her yield, and try to submit cheerfully to her fate."

This the woman muttered to herself while she worked over the senseless girl, sprinkling water upon her, chafing her hands, and rubbing her limbs. It seemed a long time before she showed aigns of recovering, but finally her eyes unclosed and wandered around the room in a bewildered way.

They rested at last upon the woman.

They rested at last upon the woman They rested at last upon the woman over her, and, memory reasserting itself, a look of hopeless misery settled in them.

But the sight of Mrs. Stillman working over her brought her quickly to herself.

"Oh, how did you manage to me?" she asked, forgetting his own and sitting up on the floor.

CONDUCTED BY UNCLE CHARLIE

ADDRESS all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. See Instructions at the close of this Department.

OP up ento my lap and read the letter that follows. The writer, Dr. Frank Bohn, who has devoted his entire life to the uplift of humanity and the cause of the plain people, has a message to deliver to you. Dr. Bohn was a lecturer on economics for years at one of our great Eastern universities, and the most forceful and illuminating articles on the subject of the War that have been contributed to the great New York dailies, and the most damning indictment of Germany and her methods, have come from his brilliant pea. Dr. Bohn is now in Switzerland doing his best to convey a message of democracy to the oppressed workers of the Central Powers. If you are interested in his views, you can address him, care of the American Embassy, Berne, Switzerland. Dr. Bohn was American delegate to the great international socialist congress at Stuttgart in 1907, and is a personal friend of Liebnecht, Germany's only real socialist, who is now in prison for opposing the Kaiser and his bloody war policies. He is also one of the founders of the Friends of German Democracy, an organization which is doing splendid work in Americanizing Germans, who, though they have sought these shores to escape military service and have received all the benefits of our free institutions, are still loyal to the land that has no use for them except to throw them into a bleed bath, break them on the wheel of militarism and use them for cannon fodder. Take Dr. Bohn's burning words to heart and profit by them, you workers of America who have been emped by German lies, and you sleepy souls who have yet failed to grasp the frightful menace to dails country that lies in Germanny's attempt to cominate the world and crush the free peoples of the earth under her merciless iron heel.

While visiting Uncle Charlie he showed me a banch of letters from people who didn't like his ideas about the war. Some of you actually accuse your Uncle Charlie of "selling out to the enemy." Now he and I are pais, and when he showed me the letters I said: "You've got to let me answer these letters."

I know intimately the workers of America from Maine to California, and as I never made any money out of writing or in any way connected with human uplift, and nobody can accuse me of "selling out." So here goes to all you comrades of mise, on the farms and in the mines, in the hill country and in the swamps. You are going to get it pretty straight. I don't want to have this war stopped until the German working people have revolted, overthrown their masters and hung the Kaiser and a hundred handpicked Junkers to the tail trees of the central park in Herlin.

park in Herlin.

Listen to this: Every German socialist and revolutionary working man, who really is revolationary, agrees that this is the right way to de the job. I know them because I talked confidentially with hundreds of them in 1915, when I traveled in Germany and Austria to find out what in thunder was the matter with the worklag people there. They said to me time and again: "We can't do this job alone. There are not enough of us who are against the Kaiser.
He has got us by the throat. Our own capitalists, editors, college professors and preachers over here are a lot of crawling worms. The Kaiser relies us through his officials, his army and his police, and at least a hundred thousand carefally educated spies."

Listen to this, you miner in West Virginia, you lumberman in Oregon, you farmer down in palica, and at least a hundred thousand carefally educated spies."

Listen to this, you miner in West Virginia, you lumberman in Oregon, you farmer down in Texas! As I was about to leave Herlin, one of the oldest veterans in the cause of the working class pulled me into a quiet corner of the Reichstag building and said: "You are going back to America. Will you take a message to the American working people for me? Don't tell them who I am until after the war because they'd hang use over here. Tell them this: That the Kaiser and his Junkers will fight America at the drop of the hat. They won't stop a minute for anybody or anything. They really believe that they can lick the world, and you bet they are going to try it. Don't go to sleep over there in America. When you go back, wake them up! The Kaiser will be on your necks the first thing you know." I refused to believe what this old gry-haired leader of the German working people teld me. I didn't think it possible the Kaiser would dare make war against the whole world. I thought that surely the German defense would break down or that there would be a German revolution in May or June. I was dead wrong. It was not Germany that went to pieces, but revolutionary Russia. If we let the Kaiser eat up the rest of Europe, Asia and Africa today, he up the rest of Europe, Asia and Africa today, he will eat up North and South America at his met meal.

up the rest of Europe, Asia and Africa today, he will eat up North and South America at his sext meal.

Let me tell you furthermore, that we make a mighty big error when we let the feelings in our hearts run away with the brains in our heads. Let's use our hrains first. Then when we hate we can hate to some advantage. This is the difference between Rockefeller and the Kaiser. Rockefeller is mot really dangerous to us, because the end of Rockefellerism is near and sure. Hut in Germany the great mass of the people, including at least half of the socialists, leve the Kaiser. Their mothers teach them to leve the Edge. Their mothers teach them to leve the Big Boss when they are bables. The first leason taught the children in every school at the beginning of the school year is a lesson in Kaiser worship. All the newspapers are full of it. It is preached by all the preachers and priests in all the churches. Kaiser worship is a religion in Germany. I know the outit well, because my parents left Germany to get away from that sort of thing. I speak German and have traveled all through Germany many times. The great mass of the German people—business people, professional people and working people, are exactly like Mohammedams a regards this religion of theirs. Metapherically speaking, they full down on their knees and lick up the dirt in the Kaiser's tracks. And they are quite ready to kill every living soul in the world who is not willing to accept their religion and put the Kaiser in the place of God Almighty. You say, "this is toe much! This must be exaggerabed!" I tell you, no! I t is not too much. I, a man of German black of God Almighty. You say, "this is toe much! This must be exaggerabed!" I tell you, no! It is not too much. I, a man of German blacker class. Now you fellows all ever this clearing and examiner. I tell you I know what is not make the dust against Uncle Charlie and me as massed as you please. In the end you must I

If Germany wins this war what will happen? Every natios in the world will arm to the teeth and militarism will hold away. For Germany will have nearly two hundred millions of seople from Belgium to Bagdad. The Kaiser will develop an army of twenty-five millions of men within fifteen years. The bigger he will build his navy the bigger ferat Britain and America will have to build theirs. The world will forget all about progress, about the interests of the working class and about labor unions. All of humanity will be slowly turned into armed devils, clenching their fists and licking their chops for the next fight. The only way to abolish militarism and imperialism from out the world is to lick the Kaiser first. Then Germany will have a revolution and create a republic. Them the working people of Germany, Great Britain, France, Italy and America, can force disarmament and lead the world toward peace and human progress.

Now don't waste all your hatred on John D. and all your love on yourself. Pass some of your gangrene along to the Kaiser and some of your love along to the poor, blind German working people, who will wake up some of these days and help us pull the Kaiser down from his throne and put him over a barrel. I am going to make one final request. Before you answer me, read all this over carefully and think one solid hour self a fair chance to see this whole thing as Uncle Charlie and I do. If you still want to take a bite out of any of your working class friends, take one out of me and not out of Uncle Charlie whom you have known so long and who deserves nothing but your confidence and affection, for no man ever loved his fellow-men or worked harder for the interests of the masses than I chel Charlie has done, and he is doing more valuable work for you now than in all his life, but some of you, lacking his knowledge and vision, are too blinded by ignorance and prefundice to realize it. Alas! The masses have always preferred to follow their enemies than remain true to their friends, and that is why we have t main true to their friends, and that is why we have the Kaiser today.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers, and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best Christmas gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of Christmas gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her ma? Is there an Aunt Charile? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

FORREST CITY (R. B. 1), ARK.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am eleven years old and in the seventh grade. I live in the country ten miles from town and my father runs a store. I have one brother in the war and the other is an experience farmer. We have about fifty mules, ten house and killed twenty-seven hogs last hogs killing day. I live on a farm of about three thousand acres and I want to know if sheep raising would be profitable here in Arkansas.

Yours sincerely, DENNIS HORTON.

sixth grade. I have begun taking music lessons to Your loving niece, BEATHOR BERGLUND.

Three cheers for Beatrice Berglund. While most of you girls are asking whether at fourteen years of age you should accept engagement rings from boys and marry a year later, and a lot of other nonsensical rot, in which the prosecution of the war and the preservation of our national existence and the upholding of right against might and tyranny plays no part, here is a little lassie only thirteen years of age devoting all her spare time to the producing of the most necessary of all things for winning the war—food. God bless those far-seeing, patriotic men and women who go into our country districts and encourage the boys and girls—the seed corn of the nation—to make the best possible use of their time in this great hour of national and world crisis. Teaching young people to be useful and rewarding them, for their efforts not only increases our food supply, but it builds character and lays the foundation of those all-necessary virtues, thrift, ambition, industry, the ability to create and produce, all of which are the fundamental essentials of a happy, prosperous, successful, worth-while life. The average boy gets more fun out of tending a garden and producing a bigger potate than his competitors than he gets in hammering a bail or shooting a squirrel. It just all depends on how the boy is trained and how his youthful energies are directed into useful instead of useless channels. I won't preach any longer, Beatrice, but will thank you on behalf of the whole Comport family for winning that prize for bread baking and getting that delightful trip to Minneapolis. If you keep on, maybe you will be able to can the Kaiser and sew him up in a sack when maybe there will be more prises for you. All I hope is that the gentleman who presented you with the forty-nine pound sack of flour did not make you hau it home on your back. If you had won in the pig contest you and the pig might have walked home together. Billy the Goat once won a sack of flour in a competition, and he got so tired hauling his prise around that he finally

DEAR UNGLE CHARLES:

I am twelve years of age and am in the sixth grade.

I went to school four years without missing a day.
The school board gives a dollar to those who go a whole term without missing a day. I have four dollars from the school board. All together I have thirty dollars in the bank, I feel like I am rich. I have three sisters and a brother. The oldest is sixteen. I have brown eyes and red hair and a bunch of freckles. I would like to know how to take them off. Please don't let Billy the Goat have this letter as it is may first one.

Your loving micec. Your loving niece, EMMA ANDERSON.

Let me congratulate you, Emma, on the two excellent qualities your letter reveals,—thrift and punctuality. The man who is always a dollar short and the guy who is always an hour late are the despair of all reformers, the exasperation of their friends, who always have to make up for their shortcomings. Functuality and thrift are two of the great cardinal virtues. On these we build character, and on character we create all that makes both individuals and nations great. That is a wise school board that rewards punctuality, for many a life has been wasted, many a career ruined and many a battle lost and a nation humbled in the dust by people who dithered and dailied and failed to appreciate the value of time instead of going on a wild jag egardless of everything, indulging in unrestrained accesses, forgetting their duty, the Kaiser would be crushed today, Germany would be a republic and we would be on the way to universal and perpetual peace. Alas, there was no wise school board to offer them money to be on time when duty was to be done, and so a continent was lost to an enemy who does what he is told and does it to the minute, and that is Germany. Keep your money in the bank, dear, and watch it grow. It will work for you while you sleep and protect you from care and worry in time of trouble. A bank book is the best book a child can possess. Billy the Goat says he was promised a dollar to be punctual at school for a whole term. He had just one more day to win the dollar, but to his disgust when he got on the scene he found a cyclone had blown the school away and he has never had the heart to save since. Don't draw your money out of the bank, but a good way to invest your future savings during the war would be to buy Thrift Stamps and War Savings Stamps.

Little children were wrested from mothers' hands and hurled against the walls of buildings. The misery and suffering of the unfortunate populace are ladescribable. It is beyond human power to relieve the grief, the mental anguish, the tortures of those afflicted by this calamity. Many die of wounds, many are driven mad. Some in agony destroy themselves while protesting against the evil that overwhelmed humanity." But the Lithuanians and other inhabitants of conquered Russia brought this calamity on themselves by turning pacifists and making peace with Germany instead of continuing in the war.

DEAR UNGLE CHARLIE AND COUSINS:

I am a small girl twelve years of age and am in the sixth grade at school. I go every day and my teacher's name is Miss Regina O'Connor. I like her fine. I enjoy reading the cousins' letters. What do you want old Santa to bring you next Christmas? I want a fountain pen. We have two old Jersey cows, six head of horses and two head of mules, and I can sweep the floor and wash and iron the clothes, wash and wipe the dishes and sometimes I help Papa clerk in the store. We are going to have an entertainment on the Fourth of July at the schoolhouse, I am going to be in a piece. The name of it is "The Lady Knitting For the Soldlers." I will close with a ridde. Sibyl's Influence

"I crawled out to bring you to, dearle, when you fainted," was the softened reply.

"Did I faint? Oh, yes, I think I must have fainted, for I remember nothing after—after—"

She could not go on, but a shudder shook her from head to foot.

"I never fainted before in my life, and I'm sorry I troubled you so," she added, apologetically, and leaning her head against the side of the bed for support.

She was still very dizzy, and could not see plainly. Mrs. Stillman made a great effort, and crept back to bed, in great contrast to her agile movements of a few moments previous. She must still keep up appearances, though she resolved that her improvement should be very rapid as soon as Sibyl was once caught in her toils—this playing the invalid was becoming very irksome to her.

"As if that even was not enough to fill my cup of sorrow, my yearly allowance suddenly ceased, and I had nothing on which to depend save the labor of my two hands. And so I have lived ever since, working for my daily bread, earning the pittance that was to keep me from starving, parting, from time, with my trinkets and treasures, until my health began to give out and I came to where you at last found me."

Mrs. Stillman lay gloomily silent after she had finished, watching, with covert glances, the fair girl sitting so white and still by the window.

Partridge Wyandottes and Young Stock

EN and women who have been keeping Wyandottes, Rocks and Reds, and like the heavy American breeds, will find in Partridge Wyandottes just what they want for a novelty, for though they have been a recognized breed way until about three years ago, since when they have been a ning in public favor steadily, and have been carrying off blue ribbons at most of the shows. So it seems safe to predict that there will be a good demand for eggs for hatching and good breeding stock for several years to come, and for utility birds they are quite as good as the white variety.

The Standard of Perfection describes them as follows: Neck, red, with distinct black striping extending down each feather and tapering to a point near the end. Back, dark red; saddle, same as neck; breast, greenish black; body and fluff, black, slightly tinged with red. Wings: primaries, black on inside web, with bay etching on outside web; terminating with greenish black at end of each feather. Wing coverts, greenish black, forming a well-defined bar of that color across the wing when folded. Bows, red; fronts, black; may be edged with red. Thighs, black, or slightly tinged with red. Legs and feet, yellow; beak, dark horn; face, wattles and earlobes, bright red. Rose Comb: Weight is the same as all other varieties of Wyandottes; roosters, eight and one half pounds; cockerels, seven and one half pounds; hens, six and one half; pullets, five and one half. The whole plumage must be glossy and intense in color. The under color should be gray or slate.

Four large breeders have assured me that the Partridge Wyandotte is as good a laver and table or slate.

Four large breeders have assured me that the Partridge Wyandotte is as good a layer and table bird as her white cousin. Eggs for hatching are now being sold for from two to ten dollars a setting according to the excellence of the breeding stock.

In taking up a breed that is coming into popular favor, it is always advisable to buy the very best birds you can afford, for you will make more money from one pair of birds which come from really aristocratic stock than from ten inferior birds.

What I have told you I could not very well help telling, in order to prove to you that you are my child, and to make you understand why I thought it best for you not to leave your present home. Years of suffering and wrong have hardened me so that I cannot pretend to any great depth of affection, and I suppose you will despise me so after this that I need not expect much from you."

chicks that are grown most rapidly return the most money. We would not force the pullets to lay before they have secured their growth, by the use of stigniants, condiments and enumenations, but pillets that are quickly grown on a good healthy diet will mature their bodies before ripening their egg organs.

Pullets that are grown in the open air consume a larger amount of food and put it to good use. The body will reach full development before she drops an egg. The ovary (the egg producing organ) is largely dependent on heat for its growth, and sometimes by keeping chicks long in heated brooders, close housing, and feeding a stimulating, heat producing ration, we can cause them to lay before the body has matured, and in that case the body will not mature to large size, or even full size for the breed. The ovary has ripened before the body has matured. Such pullets will never make good layers for any length of time, and their eggs are usually under size. It is probably on account of having grown such pullets that writers have warned us not to force birds intended for breeders or layers.

When pullets are grown right—given room, airy coops at night, free range or a large yard, and fed a wholesome ration, there is no danger of their developing too fast.

Pullets grown in confinement should have a well littered coop of good size and having large openings. That is, the greater portion of one side should be wire. The pullets should not be crowded nor should they be grown in large flocks. Pullets in confinement should be fed practically the same as those on free range. They should have the dry mash before mentioned, grit, charcoal and shells, and be fed grain and green food. Where the green food is lettuce, lawn clippings or garden refuse, they should have two grain feeds a day, and this should be scattered in litter, not too deep. Where sprouted oats are used for greens, one feed a day of hard grain is sufficient. Cockerels and old hens should not be allowed to run with pullets. When cockerels are allowed to run with

D. B.—From your description I should say the hens had infiammation of the crop, as you are sure it is not limberneck, and their crops are enlarged. Birds which have free range are very liable to crop troubles in the spring. They are so anxious to get the young grass, that they are liable to eat much of the dead grass, which covers it, which packs in the crop and prevents the food passing through to the gizzard. Another cause for such troubles on farms is the use of lime and strong fertilizers on the land, for the birds are apt to pick it up, and such strong irritants cause inflammation. First, give the birds a tablespoonful of sweet oil.
After a few minutes, hold them by the feet, head straight down, and gently manipulate the crop, pressing downwards from the breast bone. In this way a great part of the contents of the crop can usually be forced out through their bills. Every few minutes, hold the bird with its head uppermost, to allow it to recover its full breathing power. Repeat the working and pressing several times. If the crop can't be empited in this way, get some one to hold the bird on its back on a table, and with a clean, sharp knife make a cut about half an inch long in the skin over the crop, and then through the crop itself. (It is advisable to pull out a few feathers, and then thoroughly wet those around the spot to be cut, as it is easier to work when the feathers lay soft.) Hold open the cut, and with the handle of a feaspoon remove as much of the contents as you can. Thread a fine needle with white silk or cotton, and sew up the cut; first the crop, then the outer skin. Hemember, the crop and the outer skin must be sewn separately, or they will tear and break loose. Keep the bird in a small coop for a few days, and feed very lightly on mash three times a day. At the end of a week it can be returned to the flock.

and feed very lightly on mash three times a day. At the end of a week it can be returned to the flock.

H. H.—The chicks haven't been fed correctly, and the digestive organs are causing the trouble. Do you know that chicks should not be fed for thirty-six or forty-eight hours after they are hatched? The yolk of the egg is absorbed just before the chick breaks through the shell, and must be digested and ejected from the intestines before anything else enters, or the delicate machinery is upset. Instead of corn bread, moisten corn meal and feed as follows: Chop a hard boiled egg without removing the shell, mix with twice the amount of stale bread crumbs. (Put dry bread in the oven; bake until crisp, then crush.) Feed very little five times a day for two days; then you can add a little cottage cheese. After the fourth or fifth day feed finely cracked grains—corn, oats, barley, Kafir corn, mustard seed, millet—all, or any two or three you may happen to have on hand. Give them sour milk to drink from the first day, plenty of fine grit, and cottage cheese whenever you may have it.

E. B.—I don't think this is a case of disease—rather some accident. Have you been using lime, or strong spraying, or disinfectants about the premises? If so, the birds may have got some in their eyes, and, if blind, soon die for want of food and the fright caused by loss of sight. I can only advise you to try and locate the trouble and remove it, or keep the rest of the poultry confined in yards.

half a pint is scattered in front of each coop at about 4 l'. M.
Grit is supplied in large quantities. Being near a stone crusher, we buy the screenings by the cart load and dump it in heaps near the outskirts of the orchard, where it does not show, but is quite accessible to the chicks.
On these rations, without any variation, the pullets are kept until September, when they are transferred to their winter quarters.
Some say, "Don't force the chickens intended for breeders and layers," but I have found that my life."

"I know it; it would have been better if you had been kifled instead of living to see this day; but you'll have to bear it as best you can."

Sibyl sat and looked at her in blank amazement, in spite of her pain.

Could it be possible that she was the child of this cold, and heartless woman, who repelled her more and more by every word that she uttered, who seemed devoid of all natural affection, and who seemed to have no desire to cultivate either the love or sympathy of her long-lost child?

For a moment her whole soul rose in rebellion against the fate that had decreed anything so monstrous and unnatural.

War Thrift Stamps!

For Every Club Of Two We Send You One 25-Cent Stamp Free!

D O you want to help win the war but feel financially unable to buy Liberty Bonds or War Thrift Stamps?

Here then is your opportunity to do your bit and yet not invest a cent of your own money. COMFORT is willing to buy 25-Cent War Thrift Stamps and give them to you in place of a premium or cash commission. By following our easy plan you will soon have enough Stamps to fill a Thrift Card. Then you can start all over again and fill another Card—and so on. In this way you can without expense to yourself, help furnish your Country with the money it needs in order to feed, clothe, arm and equip our soldiers and sallors and win this righteous war in defense of American honor and the cause of democracy throughout the world.

Thrift Stamps—What Are They?

Thrift Stamps—What Are They?

United States 25-Cent War Thrift Stamps are the best investment in the World. They are the equivalent of War Savings Stamps, also called "little beby bonds." which—like Liberty Bonds—have behind them the entire resources of the United States.

These Thrift Stamps themselves bear no interest, but they can be exchanged for the larger War-Savings Stamps which do bear interest. When you have filled your Thrift Card with sixteen 25-Cent Thrift Stamps, you are to surrender it to any post office, bank or other authorized agency, pay a few cents in cash—17 cents in June, 18 cents in July, and so on, adding 1 cent each month—and receive in return a $5 War-Savings Stamps. With this Stamp you will also receive a War-Savings Certificate, containing spaces for twenty of these $5 War-Savings Stamps. If you should fill the twenty spaces with $5 War-Savings Stamps before July 1, 1918, the cost to you—if you bought the stamps—would be $83.40, and on Jan. 1, 1923, the Government will pay you $100—a net profit of $16.60. In other words your War-Savings Stamps—which you get in exchange for your 25-Cent Thrift Stamps—will bear 4 per cent. interest, compounded quarterly. Please understand, however, that you are not obliged to fill your War-Savings Certificates before July 1, 1918. We simply use that date to illustrate what the stamps bring you in interest. You actually have until Jan. 1, 1919, to purchase the stamps. But of course the sooner you secure them the more you will gain in interest on your investment. Therefore it's up to you to fill your Thrift Cards with 25-Cent Thrift Stamps as soon as possible, in order to exchange them for the larger $5 War-Savings Stamps that pay you 4 per cent. interest, compounded quarterly, from Jan. 2, 1918.

You Can Help Win The War By Starting A Thrift Card Today!

Every 25-Cent Thrift Stamp which you buy, or secure free on this offer, strikes a blow at our enemies and hastens the victorious ending of the war. And at the same time you are investing money in the best and safest security in the world. We consider it our duty to describe this War-Savings Thrift Plan to our subscribers and offer the Thrift Stamps to our club-raisers instead of premiums or cash commission. We have made our offer as liberal as we possibly could in order to make it easy for all to earn the stamps. By accepting our offer you can obtain all the 25-Cent Thrift Stamps you want without paying any money yourself. We shall buy the Stamps and give them to you in return for subscriptions to COMFORT.

Our Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you one 25-Cent War Thrift Stamp free and prepaid. For four one-year subscriptions we will send you two Stamps. subscriptions we will send you two Stamps, for six one-year subscriptions we will send you three Stamps—and so on. In other words, for every two subscriptions you send us we will send you one 25-Cent Thrift Stamp free. Premium No. 3662.

through all 8 stitches and fasten off.

Opinions concerning the practical value of the socks differ. One British authority praises them highly, while others who have used them claim they are inferior to the old heeled variety. It is claimed for the spirals that they wear much longer, since the heel does not always come in the same place; that they are more soft and pliable and pleasanter to the feet.

HUTCHINSON, KANS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

My husband, children and I are going to take a trip to the western coast this summer, for my health, and I would like so much to hear from others (through the Sisters' Corner) who have made the trip by automobile and sleep out of doors. We expect to cook our meals and sleep out of doors on our trip and I would like to know how to prepare for such a trip and how to pack. We shall allow six to eight weeks for the trip.

I admire the bravery of Mrs. Gaestet, of Washington state. She is a woman that will win on a farm. I have worked like a man for nearly twelve years, on a rented farm and have nothing to show for it but broken health which I am going to try and gain back and then go to a new country where prospects, climate, etc. are better.

I would like to get information direct through the paper as I haven't time to write letters.

Mrs. S.—Don't thank me for Dublishing your letter, for I had a reason all my own for doing to. Some time I'd like to take just such a trip as you describe and would like to know what to do and how to do it. Even if I am never able to carry out my plans it is a pleasure to read about the trips others have made. I should need longer than six or eight weeks for the trip, though, for I want to call on many Comfort sisters in almost every state.—Ed.

BEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

It did seem good to me this morning to listen to the lusty song of a robin as I opened my back door, and I wondered how far back east the cheery singer would betake himself about the first of April. Your Teeth and Mine

HE pretty girl bent critically over the assortment of tooth-brushes laid out by the drug-store clerk.
"But I want a soft one," she said, trying first one and then another, only trying first one and then another, only to lay it aside.

"Beg pardon, miss," said the clerk, reaching into the case; "most people want stiff brushes, so I get in the habit of showing them. But here's a soft one."

"Why, Polly," said a second girl who had been standing indifferently by, "why on earth do you get a soft tooth-brush. They re only good for babies."

COTTOP WOUND ON A TOOTH-BRUSH AND DIPPER IN LEMON JUICE WILL WHITEN THE TEETH.

COTTOP WOUND ON A TOOTH-BRUSH AND DIPPED IN LEMON JUICE WILL WHITEN THE TEETH.

"They're good for what I want them for," answered Polly mysteriously, putting down a quarter and taking the brush the clerk had submitted to her.

And Polly knew what she was talking about. A soft tooth-brush is a most convenient thing, and should be on every girl's toilet table, but not to brush her teeth with—oh, no! For that, she needs only a fairly stiff brush, the bristles of which will find their way into the crevices between the teeth and not bend against the hard surfaces, failing to cleanse the cracks and crannies. But the soft brush has its uses, too, for all teeth need an occasonal whitening, and here the stiff brush is of no avail.

To whiten the teeth, use the pulp of lemon. Instead of a tooth-brush, a small wooden toothpick wrapped in cotton batting may be used, the cotton acting as a miniature mop with which to apply the lemon.

Not only the beauty but the health of the teeth depend upon punctilious care being taken of them. Brush them on rising, that any secretions of the night may be disposed of and leave your mouth fresh and sweet. Then after every meal wield the tooth-brush again to remove any particles of food which may have lodged between the teeth or on the gums. Brush from the gums toward the tips of the teeth—not across them. This lets the bristles cleanse the crevices thoroughly. Brush also the inner surfaces of the teeth, and the grinding surfaces of the back teeth. When you think you have quite completed your toilet, add a postscript by reaching for your spool of dental floss. Cut off a piece about three inches long, and holding one end in each hand insert it between the teeth. Do not press it down hard toward the gums, but after it is held between the teeth work it up and down, drawing it firmly against first the side of one tooth and then the other.

Take a fresh piece of floss and treat the next two teeth in the same way, and so on until all the crevices have been cleaned. Then give a last brush to the after a moment or two with a quick brushing in clear water.

And, girls, don't underrate the value of beautiful, white, healthy teeth. They can make even the silliest smile attractive, and what can they not do for the girl whose smile is naturally sweet and delightful?

Healthy teeth, too, mean that you will escape a great many other bodily fils, for rheumatism, swollen joints, headaches, and numerous other ailments, can oftentimes be traced to ill-kept teeth. So don't forget to use your tooth-brush five times a day, will you?—morning and night, and after each meal.

Answers to Questions

MRS. PEARL C.—I am sorry that you will not receive this answer as soon as I should like to have you. The letters come to me in one big batch just before time to write the answers for Compor, and that is usually a couple of weeks after the letter is written. Then, you see, it is three or four months before the magazine can be mailed to you, because in printing a magazine with such a big circulation as Comport it has to be started a long time beforehand. Under the rules of this department, all letters have to be answered in these columns, instead of by mail. While your answer is late, I hope you' will follow the suggestions I give you. First, you should take the unskimmed milk, when you are on the milk diet, in order to get the benefit of the nourishment in the cream. Of course the milk will make you feel "awfully full," as you say, but that is natural. Be sure not to eat solid food but exactly follow the instructions given. Yes, indeed, I think your bust will develop. As you gain on the milk diet, your bust will gain as well as the other parts of the body. Arm exercises will also help to develop the bust, and deep breathing exercises, but I appreciate what you say about being a busy farmer's wife, and know that it is difficult to work anything in the way of special ex-ercises into such a busy life as yours. Try to make a practice, however, of holding the back erect, and the chest somewhat forward, while the arms drop easily at the shoulders, and breathe in as deeply as you can.

at the shoulders, and breathe in as deeply as you can.

Miss D. M.—Too bad you couldn't give some of that too large bust to Mrs. Pearl C., isn't it? You say your waist is too large, also, but you do not give me the size, so I am not sure just how much advice you need. The waist should be ten inches smaller than the bust and hips, and the bust should be the same size as the hips. I hope no girl with a slim bust will read this, and start right in trying to reduce her waist! Of course what she should do is to increase her bust until it is ten inches larger than her waist. As for you, are you a little over weight all over? You do not tell me, and that is the first thing I ought to know, for if you are, then it is your diet which should be changed as quickly as possible. Cut out sweets, and do not eat many potatoes, much rice, macaroni or white bread, avoid gravies, rich desserts, cream and milk. In the meantime, practice the following exercises:

To Reduce the Waist

Standing with heels together, hands at sides, body erect, bend forward from the waist, without bending the knees, and try to touch the floor with the fingertips. Don't struggle over this, but lift the hands up over the head, and bending only at waist throw them forward toward the floor. You will probably be a long way from touching it, but don't be discouraged; practice this fifteen or twenty times, and at night do it again, and the next morning, start all over again. In other words, practice twice a day for fifteen or twenty times. After a few days it will be easier for you to make the necessary movement, and little by little your fingers will get nearer and nearer the floor.

To Reduce the Bust

Standing in the same position, raise arms in front of you, and let the palms meet, elbows rigid and arms on level with the shoulders. Now throw the arms back violently as if seeking to make then meet in the middle of the back. Keep them on a level with the shoulders. Throw them forward, again, then back; and so continue for fifteen or twenty times.

shoulders. Throw them forward, again, then back; and so continue for fifteen or twenty times.

GOLDEN ROD.—You say you have crooked legs, but you do not say whether they are bowed or whether the knees turn in. You can do a great deal for "crooked legs" by exercise. Look at yourself in the mirror and see what the matter is—that is, which way the legs curve. And at the same time, be generous with yourself and don't make matters seem worse than they are. Lots of women have a little curve to their legs, but you see them wearing the smart short frocks and high boots, not at all disturbed about it. So don't take your little defect too seriously. Be careful to have your stockings trim and smooth, and your shoes well fitting and always carefully polished, and above all things see that they are never or your over at the heel. The moment they begin to run over at the heel. The moment they begin to run over, take them to the cobbler and spend twenty-five cents having them straightened. It will make your shoes last longer and they will always look well. I wouldn't wear too long dresses—they are apt to look slouchy and not at all "smart." Unless your legs are terribly bowed—and I'm sure they are not—wear your dresses a nice trim length, and, as I have said above, be careful to dress your feet well. Lots of people are careless about keeping their shoes trim, with neat laces or with buttons always on, and freshly polished. If you will only take pains, you can make your feet very good to look upon. Next, practice these exercises, if the legs are bowed—that Is, if the knees turn out.

For Bowed Legs

Stand with the feet about eighteen inches apart, and the hands on hips. Now turn the weight of the body on the inside of the feet, and bring the knees together without lifting the feet. This means that you will dip the body toward the floor. Do not, however, bend the back, but keep your spine straight, and let the only dip be that you descend a few inches toward the floor as you bring the knees together. Resume first position, and repeat, learning to do this continuously and rapidly. Practice until your muscles feel tired. Do this at least twice day.

Another experise is to stand erect, hands on hips. Stand with the feet about eighteen inches apart, and Do this at least twice day.

Another exercise is to stand erect, hands on hips, and turn the toes in and heels out, so that they form a V with the toes making the point of the letter. Now walk across the room with your feet in that position. Rest a moment, and walk back. Rest again, and walk across the room again. Practice this frequently. You see the principle of the exercise, do you not? Any position which brings the knees in and exercises the muscles on the outside of the legs will help you.

M. C. C.—Yes, five feet, six inches and a half is a

but that won't be for long, and when you begin to fill out you will be so delighted that you aren't even an inch shorter. Just be careful to eat nourishing food, and to drink lots of water, and to sleep eight or nine hours every night—even ten won't hurt—and to exercise in the open air as much as possible.

We find many Christians among our soldier boys, and we regret much that Uncle Sam has not seen yet that the cigarette belongs in the class with the saloon, and should be prohibited among our soldiers, along with booze.

PREBLE, N. Y.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMPORT READERS:

This is my second letter to dear old COMPORT but I thought if it wouldn't be too crowded I would venture to write again. My first letter was published last July and I have received letters from all over the United States. At present I am corresponding with a dear lady in W. Va., my own age (twentyfive) and I wouldn't want her to discontinue writing. I hope I am not intruding by writing again so soon, but, bnoest, I'm so lonely. At present my husband is in Indiana buying a carload of horses and won't return for another week. My elight-year-old daughter is lots of company, but she is at school most of the time. We have bought a piano for her and she is taking music lessons of a Conservatory graduate, and doing splendidly.

I am going to ask the sisters a question that no doubt will make some of them smile, but how many have tried to burn tin cans? I do and it works like a charm and I think I am real smart in doing so as fuel is so scarce. One must have a bed of red hot coals (I wouldn't recommend a wood fire) and drop in two or three and in a few hours they will be red hot and in time they will crumble up and go out with the ashes. A furnace is best of all for that purpose but I have only a coal stove.

I haven't much to say on the country and city discussion: I have lived in both places and prefer the city because of the educational advantages. My country life wasn't very pleasant; we lived fourteen miles from the city and the roads were most always bad so we seldom went anywhere.

Mrs. J. E. Knight, if you see this, don't think I've forgotten you. I received so many letters it was impossible to answer all of them.

A few have written how they help their husbands. I help mine by doing all my own work, sewing and try to run my home as economically as I know how. Mrs. R. T. W., I used to stammer and was so bad I couldn't read or talk to anyone and when I was called upon to read or

Can anyone recommend a sure cure for indigestion?

I am troubled a great deal with it. Sometimes I go on a diet and sometimes I try starving myself but I still have "the old wedge" in my stomach. Have never consulted a physician. If "Peachle" sees this I hope she remembers me. She surely couldn't forget "Dandy Cute."

I won't offer any recipes to this good paper till I try them myself, besides I could hardly offer a new one, the paper is always full of em and some mighty good ones, too. I like Comfort from beginning to end and wouldn't be without it at any price for it is my most valuable paper.

Best wishes to your whole magazine, and you, Mrs. Wilkinson.

"But the servants would hardly have let them?" incredulously.

The butter asked permission to speak, a ray of hope in his face.
"If you please, your honor, Sir Thomas is right," he said. "After placing the soup on the table, I went to announce supper, and sent the other men off to attend to various things, so that, when I got back five minutes after, the room was empty. "Her ladyship—Lady Levallion—was in the dlning-room when you got back?" evenly.
"No sir! but outside the door," respectfully. But for one long instant Sir Thomas Annesley stood speechless with rage and surprised horror. Would they dare to think it was Ravenel who had done it?

CHAPTER XXVIII.

"I SAW-NO ONE !"

"No one dares to insinuate," he broke out the second he got his breath, "that——"
"No," said the coroner quietly. "Be good enough, Sir Thomas, to tell just what you saw of this woman outside. Did you observe her on that oversion only?" that occasion only?

"Your dog appears to be ubiquitous!" dryly.

"You know the man?"

The room was breathless with interest. Every soul in it, except Carrousel, leaned forward; but the question had apparently such that the man is considered the park. The such that the man is considered the park. The such that the missed him—" He stopped something on the end of his tongue, as if he remembered there was no need to tell more than he was asked.

"The man," said Sir Thomas unwillingly, "was, to the best of my belief, Captain Gordon, though I thought him in bed at the castle. Levallion said he'd gone to bed, as he was leaving early in the morning."

And if he had known the deadly gist of his evidence taken with Lady Gwendolen's, he would have perjured himself ten times over.

"The woman was no one of the house-party? You are sure?" searchingly.

"She was a stranger, so far as I could tell. All the other women were in the drawing-room but my sister, and she and Levallion went in there while I was hanging out of the hall window watching the woman in the garden."

"You are sure it was Captain Gordon in the wood?"

"How was he dressed?"

"In a Norfolk jacket and loose knickerbockers. I saw them against the moonlight."

"You say Lord Levallion seemed to know who the woman was?"

Tommy nodded.

I'm sure he did! He said afterward that it must have been a kitchen-maid; but maids don't wear trains and long evening cloaks. I meant to tell him I'd seen her again, but when I went to his dressing-room last night before dinner he wouldn't talk. And I drank some of the liqueur that he died of four hours afterward. It was all right then!"

WHY AM I SO THIN?

Wrong Eating and Bad Digestion the Cause

By Dr. J. W. Campbell

Copyright, 1918, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

Y "too thin" I mean people who do not weigh as much as they should in accordance with their height and to be normally healthy. The table of heights and weights appended to this will help you to decide as to whether you weigh enough. There are some exceptions. If your parents were both slight, you may be normally healthy and yet somewhat under weight according to the table.

These sound somewhat disconcerting to the layman. If your doctor, upon examining you, tells you that some one or two of these things are among your afflictions, do not become frightened. Remember that hyperacidity is nothing more or less than old-fashioned "sour stomach" Intestinal congestion is constipation, mal-assimilation may cover several stomach ills, as it is a general title for "bad digestion," while intestinal fermentation means that the food still contains too much acid after it has left the stomach and passed into the thirty odd feet of intestinal tubing.

Of all these, the old-fashioned "sour stomach"

Of all these, the old-fashioned "sour stomach

passed into the thirty odd feet of intestinal tubing.

Of all these, the old-fashioned "sour stomach (so called because our grandmothers and great grandmothers used to refer to hyperacidity in these terms) is probably the worst. It is a true disease and brought about by too much acid in the stomach, which causes the food to digest imperfectly and leave the stomach too quickly. From this condition the other ills of the digestive organs just named will arise. Hyperacidity causes intestinal congestion, and this, in turn, brings on "sick headaches," torpid liver and other complaints of a similar nature.

The nutrition from our food is absorbed through millions of little tubes in the mucous membrane or lining of the stomach. Too much acid in the stomach causes irritation of this lining, the tiny tubes begin to close and our bodies begin to get less and less of the necessary nourishment from the food. This impoverishes the blood and a persom may eat and eat, but if there is an excess of acidity in the stomach they will not get the benefit of the food, and thus become thin.

Hyperacidity brings on other ills, ills that make people thin, even to the semblance of "living skeletons." The presence of too much acid causes the starch atoms in our food to become crystallized. Especially is this true of cereal starches. This makes blood crystals which causes gout, rheumatism, lumbago, hardening of the arteries, stiffness of the joints, rheumatoid and other more or less serious allments. Another result is that the excess of stomach acid causes fermentation in both stomach and intestines. This distends them and they press against the arteries, causing irregular heart beats, known as valvular heart action.

The most common reason why over-eating may cause one to be thin, the the the excess of acid.

irregular heart beats, known as valvular heart action.

The most common reason why over-eating may cause one to be thin is that the excess of acid irritates the mucous membrane or lining of stomach and intestines and causes an abnormal appetite. This leads to so much over-eating that autointoxication or food poisoning takes place. This may result in several forms of illness, one of them being emaciation or underweight. People who eat heartily and yet remain extremely thin cannot understand why this should be. The little canals and nerve fibers leading out from the intestines also become irritated, causing worry, nervousness, insomnia, loss of memory and, of course, loss of weight.

If you are too thin, the logical thing to do course, loss of weight.

If you are too thin, the logical thing to do is to relieve the hyperacidity or sour stomach as practically all other ailments of the stomach result from this. This stomach acidity may be caused by one of a number of errors in the things you eat and the manner in which you eat or combine them, or it may be caused by a combination of these errors, which include the following:

The coroner nodded, knowing it already.

"I won't trouble you any more," he said. "Except to ask you if you would know that mysterious woman if you saw her again?"

Even Carrousel waited for the answer.

"I don't know," reluctantly. "I'd know her if she wore those clothes, but I never saw her face. Only I'm sure that she had something to do with the thing."

"You were not in the house at the death of your brother-in-law, I think?"

"I ran out the back way after Jacobs. I thought he was after the cook, and I tore upstairs and then down and outside till I found Jacobs, trying to get back into the house again.

"To overcome this, first of all limit the quantity of food you eat to the actual needs of your body. Endowing:

appetite and hunger. When you have eaten sufficient to nourish the body and keep you until next meal time, you have appeased your hunger, although your appetite may be nearly as keen appetite and hunger. When you have eaten sufficient to nourish the body and keep you until next meal time, you have appeased your hunger, although your appetite may be nearly as keen as ever.

Omit, for a while at least, white bread and the soft, sticky cereals. Omit the sour fruits and all sweets. If your case of thinness is a severe one, give up tea and coffee, tobacco and liquors. When I have told this to many of my patients they have exclaimed: "But what may I eat?" Include in your fattening diet plenty of milk and ergs, plenty of fish and fresh vegetables. The best vegetables are potatoes, carrots, parsnips, onions, cabbages, squash, corn and beans. By omitting white bread I do not mean to cease eating all bread. Eat the plain wheat bread or bread cooked with a little wheat bran in it. Eat wheat for cereals, boiling it five or six hours, and serve it with butter or cream but no sugar.

Drink an abundance of water throughout the water with meals, but do not gulp down the water with meals, sip it, for if you wash down the food by copious drinks you spoil much of the mastication of food and without good mastication there cannot be good digestion. The water drinking is important, quite as important as the remainder of the diet. The human body is largely water more than fitty per cent, and in order for water to enter the blood, which is necessary, it must pass into circulation with the food. This water drinking not only dilutes the acid of the stomach but it relieves irritation and, with the irritation from acid stomach relieved, the difficulty is half overcome.

"I have a perfectly good stomach, doctor, and can eat anything without becoming distressed, yet I am as thin as a rail and I'm sure it must be through some other cause than digestion," declared one of my patients.

"You have a bad stomach," I contradicted him. Still another patient made bitter complaint of his stomach to me. He was a wery fat man, away beyon that condition politicly called "stout," "You have a good stomach, and stout feel in the workst

Then I sent for you, as soon as I found out what had happened."

Tommy moved to Houghton's side as one after one the house-party came in, and had, except Lord Chayter, to acknowledge that they had all heard and talked of Lady Levallion's flirtation with her husband's cousin. Houghton laid a quick hand on his shoulder, for the boy was livid with fury and outraged pride. Each guest in Levallion's house had given his or her version of his wife's flirtation with Adrian Gordon, come by either from sight or hearsay; of Levallion's knowledge of it; of his quarrel with his wife half an hour before he died.

"My God!" whispered Tommy, half-choked, "Do they mean—"

"Hush! Wait!" said Houghton, in his ear.

"There is only Chayter left."

And Lord Chayter, to Tommy's surprise, had other things to say. To his knowledge, and Lady Levallion's, some one had been in the habit of spying round the house after dark. He had twice seen a face at the dining-room window, and had once pointed it out to Lady Levallion. Had also told Lord Levallion, who said it was nonsense. But Lord Chayter was of the opinion that Levallion had not meant what he said. "There were plenty of people, men and—well, more especially women, if you like! who had a grudge against Levallion." (With which the jury agreed.) "In my opinion, that loiwere was probably one of them," ended Lord Chayter abruptly. "That's what it seems to me."

And Sir Thomas could have hugged the ugly little man. Aston called the last witness.

The room was packed by this time. Every one in the house but the boot-boy being in it, and no one had remembered him. Alone, through the silent, deserted house, Lady Levallion came to the shut door of the library, and, as if she saw none of the familiar faces, walked into the hot, close room.

She wore the coarse, blue serge Houghton had seen her in at dawn. Levallion had hated black. She had not a black gown to wear, and did not try three times before she could answer the first question.

"Yes," she said huskily, "it was I who went to my husband' try three times before she could answer the first question.

"Yes," she said huskily, "it was I who went to my husband's room for that bottle of liqueur."

"Before that," said the coroner unexpectedly, "what had you been doing?"

"I was down in the hall talking up to him. I wanted to go out and he would not let me. He was annoyed with me because of something he imagined, till I told him why I wanted to go out."

I wanted to go out and he would not let me. He was annoyed with me because of something he imagined, till I told him why I wanted to go out."

"Why was it?"

"A woman whom I had known was dying. She sent for me. I showed Levallion her letter, and he said we would both go after the others had gone to bed."

"He was not annoyed, then?"

"Oh, no!" lifelessly.

"Why had he thought you wished to go out?"

"I dropped a card with some writing on it. Levallion thought it referred to last night, whereas it was one I never got, and four months old."

"How did it reach you, then?"

"My stepmother's maid had it. It was she who was dying and wanted to explain something to me that I knew already."

"What—exactly?"

"I don't think I need say. It concerned," she twisted her hands hard together, "no one but me and Levallion," she finished unexpectedly.

"Was it the card, a four-months'-old card, that was taking you out?"

"No. The woman who sent it to me was dying, and wrote me two letters begging me to come to her that night and let her tell me something before it was too late. She had behaved badly to me. She was sorry."

"And Lord Levallion would not allow it?"

"On the contrary, he was going to take me, but—" she could not finish. With a sharp breath, an uncontrollable passion, she cried out: "Oh! Doctor Aston. I think, now that I've had time to think, that perhaps the woman knew something, knew some one meant to poison Levallion. That it was that which made her send for me. And I didn't go. I can't forgive myself that I didn't go!"

"Where are her letters?"

"I can't"—Carrousel looked really affected—"I can't find them. I thought Levallion had them. Weren't they in his pocket?"

"No. They have never been heard of till now. But I can easily send for the woman."

"She died last night," said Lady Levallion slowly. "Some one must have her letters. Some one might have picked them up when—he fell." The last two words seemed to choke her."

But I can easily send for the woman."

"She died last night," said Lady Levallion solowly.

those letters.
"Lord Levallion was annoyed about a card?"
the coroner barked back obstinately.

JULY COMFORT

will be an interesting and instructive number that no one can afford to miss. Besides other special features a splendid war story by Hapsburg Liebe, entitled

"The Mother of the Regiment," is a strong portrayal of the in-there of the noble, self-sacrificing women who are doing war work behind the battle-front to help the fighting, man to help the fighting-men.

Child conservation is one of the national problems engaging public attention this second year of the war. How to keep up the health and strength of young children on a war-time diet is an all-important question.

Dr. W. Clyde Overton, specialist on diseases of children, will tell, in July COMFORT, how to feed and care for children under school age. A most valuable and instructive article by an eminent authority.

2-Year Renewal to Cost 50 Cents July First

On and after July First the yearly subscription rate will be 35 cents, and a two-year renewal will cost 50 cents. In our May issue we announced this advance in rate to take effect June 1, but have postponed the date to July first for reason stated elsewhere. If the number over your name on the wrapper on this magazine is 357 or any less number, it means that your subscription needs to be renewed at once.

The present low renewal rate will continue in force until July first, which gives our present subscribers an opportunity to renew their subscriptions

Emazella's Prophecy

By Joseph F. Novak

(See front cover illustration) Copyright, 1918, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"There is a history in all men's lives,
Piguring the nature of the times deceas'd,
The which observed, a man may prophocy,
With a near dim of the main chance of things
As yet not come to life."
Shakespeare:—2nd Henry IV.

HE dignified old street leading from the college buildings of Eaglehurst Saminary to town, lay dosing indolently, abeltered from the sun by the immense linden trees which arched their graceful branches across it.

abeltered from the sun by the immense linden trees which arched their graceful branches across it.

For a long time not a soul appeared upon it, then from behind a beautiful mansion which had been closed during the winter, the figure of a girlemerged and stood looking cautiously about. She gazed down the street toward the college buildings, then seeing that the classes had not been dismissed, she went back of the house again, and sat down on the steps.

The girl's name was Emazella. Emazella—what? Simply Emazella, for she was a Gipsy, hence the single name. She belonged to a band of these wandering people. They had pitched their camp outside the confines of the small college town, and had been warned to keep out under pain of arrest for vagrancy.

The warning had been given to the Gipsy chief, and as he didn't wish to take chances on being arrested and locked up, he respected the wishes of the town authorities, but nevertheless determined that, if his people could not ply their trade of selling lace scarfs, mantilias and various merchandise that was warranted "made by hand in Spain." but was more likely run out by machinery in some factory on this side of the ocean, he would chance sending Emazella into the town and sending Emazella into the town to tell fortunes, at which art the girl was an adept. She could read fortunes in paims, in cards, in the stars, and was expert at crystal gazing.

And so Dancairo, the Gipsy chief, decreed that he was, would fall for the girl's skill in such matters merely for the amusement of the thing. However, Emazella was told to be seen as little as possible, for though they had been bidden to desist from canvassing houses with their familiar introductions of "laidy, vant your fortune thoid?" nothing had been said about doing it on the street. She was a picturesque figure to look upon as she sat there, her rich, abundant black hair gathered up in careless fashion, but which had, nevertheless, a certain attraction that was enhanced by the wild flowers fastened in it. Her dress cons dark eyes.

For some time she sat there, utterly oblivious to the fact that at a window above, but standing so that he could not be seen from below, a man, somewhere between twenty-five and thirty years of age, was looking interestedly down upon her. Emazella now made another trip to the sidewalk. But this time, down at the college buildings, there was a steady exodus of daintily gowned young women, which grew larger and began to surge down the street.

Emazella, thereupon, partially hid herself behind one of the big gate-posts, and waited. A young woman went by, then another, then a group of three, then another couple. But these girls had purposeful looks, ones who would not indulge fortune telling. Emazella could read human faces as well as human palms, and so she passed these up and waited eagerly for a group which she now espied, a half-dozen brilliant girls, who, from their dress, manner and general carefree air, she at once "spotted" as the daughters of rich men.

So when they came up, she stepped from her partial concealment, swung down the street toward them with her athletic, yet graceful carriage, with its movement so suggestive of the wild czardas which she danced so well with her Gipsy brethren, and accosted them with her formal statement:

"Laidies, vant your fortune thold?"

"Ye Gods, what an apparition! No, child, I

"Ye Gods, what an apparition! No, child, I don't want my fortune told. I'm too satisfied with the prospects of the future to delve into it now!" exclaimed Diana Belmont.

it now!" exclaimed Diana Relmont.

She was a tail, well-formed blonde, exquisitely dressed in a soft, pale-pink gown, with a cluster of lilies-of-the-valley at her belt. She wore a broad-brimmed Panama hat with a silken scarf around it, not because it was quite the fashion, but because a certain somebody had sent it to her from the Canal Zone and so she wanted to show it off, even as she did the diamond la vallere which she had about her throat, a graduation present from her father.

She was a beautifully featured girl, yet there was something about the lines of her mouth that affected one unpleasantly, a slight sarcasm perhaps, which boded no good for anyone who came affected one unpleasantly, a slight sarcasm perhaps, which boded no good for anyone who came under her disfavor.

"Oh, come, let us listen to what this Gipsy creature can tell us! It will be tremendously amusing!" guahed Alice Fenton, who, with the exception of also being extremely well dressed, was all the opposite of Miss Belmont, being short and piquant, with baby features that laughed always. She was always full of mischief and about as dignified as a dandellon.

To Miss Fenton's exclamation, three of the group, Clara Greer, Sadie Rendeau and Flo Section, agreed it would be "altogether too lovely and most econderfully romantic!"

The sixth young woman, Miss Evelyn Clayton, objected.

The sixth young woman, Miss Evelyn Clayton, objected.
"I don't believe I have the time," she said, but they insisted that she stay, and accordingly she did.

It was not really the fact that she hadn't the time that Miss Clayton objected. It was the cost of the prank. Money, to her, was always a bugaboo. She was decidedly poor, and entirely dependent upon herself for her education and maintenance, and naturally did not have any spare deliars for the romantic pastime of fortune-telling.

teiling.

In spite of her poverty, she kept up with the rich girls of the Seminary. They liked her; she possessed personality. Beautiful she was, beauty she had, but no one suspected it, though everyone agreed that she was the "finest looking" girl of the Seminary. She had not the clothes is set off her beauty, and was always obliged to make her appeal by her exquisite neatness. And yet, she had that vague something we call "tyle," and always was a dominant figure among righer gewined girls.

Her temper was even, her tact great, and her good humor endless, and that, perhaps, was why she kept up with those her superiors as moneymade social standards go. And they, in turn, were anxious to keep her good-will, for, while she was in no sense a "grind," her mind was open and susceptible to impression, and many hard lessons were made plain to the girls about her through her simple explanations.

Again, in matters of dress, she was clever; she had to be, and no one realized that her graduation gows, such a terror to those who cannot go to a fashionable modiste, order a creation and "send the bill to father!" was being fashioned by her own hands and those of her boarding-house keeper whom she often helped in many little matters.

She wanted to work on that, since the afternoon was to be free, and so did not care to waste any time, but the importuning of the girls kept her.

her.

"Come, Carmen is getting impatient," Alice laughed. "Your name is Carmen, isn't it?" she rattled on, turning to the Gipsy.

"No, Emazella, laidy," the girl answered.

"Very well, come on, girls," cried Alice.

Emzselia would not allow this. "No, cannot tell fortune where more two is," she explained.

"Well, let us group up," said Alice, and accordingly they did, Diana pairing off with Evelyn.

Evelyn.

Emazella led Alice and Miss Greer to the little summer house in the rear of the big mansion. The shrieks of laughter that emerged, teld of something amusing, apparently, and after a wait of some time, the two girls came forth.

"Oh, gracious, girls!" Miss Fenton exploded, "after I crossed her hand with a silver dollar, she promised me a widower with seven children! "Seven kits," Emazella said!" and off she went into a paroxysm of laughter nigh onto hysteria.

Miss Rendeau and Miss Seeton were soon taken in by Emazella, and Diana and Evelyn came for theirs.

Miss Rendeau and Miss Secton were soon taken in by Emazella, and Diana and Evelyn came for theirs.

"Laides, sit down," Emazella said, waving her hands to the seats within the little summer house, and the two girls did so, while Emazella seated herself opposite.

"Tell me something nice, Emazella," Diana admonished, as she cut the cards.

The Gipsy looked up with professional dignity, not untouched with scorn.

"I tell what zda cards tell, zdat's all," she replied, and began spreading them out, her looks darkening as she saw the ill-omed lay-out.

"Zdat's bad," she murmured, "zdat's fierce! Laidy gonna lose lover to brown hair laidy. She nearly engaged to nice man who t'ink she lovely, but laidy got bad temper, so zda cards say! La Virgen! Zdis fierce!

"Thrilling," commented Diana sarcastically.

"I see letters zdat laidy get an' no——"
Diana's face grew white.

"Nonsense! How dare you tell me amything of the sort? I don't believe a word of it! There's your money. Come, Evelyn, don't let us listen to her foolish stuff! The idea! I, ill-tempered! I'm not an angel, thank heaven, but I hardly relish being told that I am not. Come," and she rose in a passion.

Emazella tried to pacify her. She placed her hand timidly on Diana's shoulder. "Don't go, laidy," she pleaded, "all fortune can no be all good. Maybe nicer in zda palm."

Diana almost struck the detaining hand from her shoulder and marched away, followed by Evelyn.

But she did not notice that in her angry movements.

Diana turned upon Evelyn with fury in her eyes.

"The idea!" she almost shricked. "Will you take this vagabond's part against me? Humbilate me before her? You," and she turned to the trembling Emasella, "I've got a good notion to turn you over to the police.

The mention of the police nearly frightened the girl out of her wits.

"No, no," she cried, "call me t'ief, call me anyt'ing, no hand me police! I no steal, no, laidy, no seworita, I no steal!"

"Don't be angry, Diana," pacified Evelyn, "but really you have no proof that the girl stole the la vailiere. The evidence is circumstantial, of course, but the jewel is recovered, and whether she intended to steal or not, we cannot say. Come," and her volce grew pleading, "I don't wish to take the girl's part against you, and I wagree that you have grounds for your suspicions, but there's nothing absolutely sure, you know."

"Oh, very well. Comfort your Gipsy friend if you prefer," and Dlana stalked away.

"Oh, laidy got ver' bad temper like cards say," observed Emazella. "I so sorry. She your friend, an' now she mad 'cause you say I no steal:"

"Don't mind that, Emazella. I've overlooked

"Don't mind that, Emazella. several little tempests that Dlana indulged; she'll probably get over this one, too."
"Come, I tell your fortune, for not'ing," Emazella said. "You good laidy, an' maybe I tell

"Come, I tell your fortune, for not'ing," Emazella said. "You good laidy, an' maybe I tell somet'ing mice."

"No, Emazella," Evelyn said.
"But I want," she persisted, and as she was so anxious, Evelyn allowed her to do so, and cut the cards as per direction.
"Everyt'ing look nice for you. Lots of money come you, an' zda men! Valgame Dios! You can haf all kinds! But you gonna get zda lover of zda laidy what call me t'lef," she continued, her brow darkening.

For some time she rambled on in the midst of the most extravagant dreams, to which Evelyn listened with good-natured indulgence, placing about as much faith in that sort of thing as she did in the omnipotency of Buddha.

"Verily, Emazella," she laughed, "you have a terrific imagination. We should have discovered you sooner, and had you for class prophet. How much more attractive is your prophecy compared to what they have foretold for me, a life spent in the classic drudgery of teaching,"

"What I say, true laidy, true," Emazella averred solemnly, "No laugh, laidy, it come true."

"If it should, Emazella, I should be the hapaverred solemnly. "No laugh, laidy, it come true."

"If it should, Emazella, I should be the happlest person in the world, especially were I to win the wonderful man you say I shall. But that is impossible, though had I a man of his callber for a husband, to love, cherish and protect me, how little would all the wealth, the glory and honor which you promise me tempt me. Foolish children we, to think that we can pierce the veil of the future! But I cannot linger, Emazella. Be a good girl, dear. I believe you are honest, and I should be very sorry to hear that you were not. Good by."

And so saying, she pressed the Gipsy girl's hand lightly, and left the little summer-house, not observing that Emazella shortly followed her, unseen, as far as her boarding-house.

That place reached, she went up to her room, and for the rest of the afternoon, busily sewed Revelyn.

But she did not notice that in her angry movements, the beautiful la valliere had unfastemed and slipped to the ground.

Emazella looked sorrowfully after them; she had read the cards as they should be read, as their lay-out warranted, and had offended the lady. Now there would be little chance of telling fortunes for any of the other girls of the Seminary.

With a sigh she put away the money she had received, and was about to go, when suddenly she noted the la valliere. Her eyes widened in wonder as she picked up the costly thing and gazed at it in amazement, while from behind the vine-covered trellice work which formed the wall of the little summer house, the same man who had looked from the window above watched the whole affair. At the mention of the letters, his eyes had flashed, but immediately he forgot that in what followed and now he watched to see what the girl would do with the necklace.

But whatever Emazella's thoughts might have been cannot be determined, for just then, as she held the thing admiringly before her eyes, Diana rushed into the summer house with Evelyn at her heels, and beheld her lost jewel.

"You thief!" she accused, "how dared you steal that! Give it to me at once!"

Almost dazed, Emazella handed it over.

"I no steal, laidy," she protested, "I find it." "Nonsense, you took it from my throat as I went out, you know you did."

"I no steal," she presisted, "you laidy," turning to Evelyn, "you no see me steal?"

"No, Emazella," Evelyn said, a bit soberly, for she did not wish to antagonize Diana.

"Mil gracias, schorits?" Emazella said, lapsing into Spanish, "I tank you tousand times!"

Diana turned upon Evelyn with fury in her eyes.

"The idea!" she almost shrieked. "Will you ing her chance acquaintance of the morning."

ment, a thrill of terror possessed her, then the curtain was drawn aside, and Emazella aat her self down on the window ledge.

She was visibly excited.

"Why, Emazella!" Evelyn exclaimed, recognizing her chance acquaintance of the morning, "what's the matter?"

"Zat laidy, w'at call me t'ief, she I hate! I go in trance, I see she lose lover to you! But you must be beautiful, I bring you to make yes beautiful? I it no steal, laidy, I make it myself. Mantilla, laidy, beautiful mantilla, I give you it, for not'ing. You wear, you be beautiful, si?"

"But Emazella—" Evelyn began, but she got no further, for the girl interrupted:

"No talk, you kind to Emazella. She will pray to la Virgen that you get other laidy's lover!" And she was gone.

Evelyn stood for several minutes, holding the untidy wrapped parcel, then she opened it and from the rough outer cover, she took something wrapped in tissue. This opened, revealed a long lace scarf, as dainty as a fairy-web, yet so long and wide that as she held it on her arm, both ends reached the ground at the same time. A cry of glad surprise escaped her, then with a woman's deft fingers, she draped it about her dress, in the manner of the latest fashion.

It was the touch of ornament needed, and made her plain gown a creation.

And yet, for some moments, she was a bit diffident about using it. The rich lace, the tedious hand-work of the Gipsy girl, would haw commanded a great price in the shops. She felt she ought to return it to the girl, or at least, buy it from her, but to pay the actual price would be out of the question; she hadn't the money.

Again she surveyed herself, she saw that she would outshine Diana, for she had seen that girl's gown. She laughed servously, then criesiout softly to herself:

"Nonsense, Evelya, are you becoming suparstitious? Hal Bronstone is down in Panama and after tomorrow you'll go your way and never meet him, so what if you do outshine Diana? And have you ever schnowledged to yourself that after tomorrow you'll go your way and never meet him, so what if you do outshine Diana? And have you ever acknowledged to yourself that you love Hal, and do you suppose he thinks of that little flirtation of a year gone?"

Whereupon, she blushed, and turned out the light.

The Convocation Exercises were over and the gold of afternoon was on the landscape. Out at the Seminary grounds were the customary crowds attendant upon the Graduation Day Exercises. The white-gowned young women, the adoring lovers and proud parents mixed in an inspirate bedge region.

Ing lovers and proud parents mixed in an inspiring hodge-podge.

To Evelyn it had been a day. She had made a pronounced impression. How the girls chided her, asked who her fairy godmother was, and disbelieved that it was only the scarf that made all the difference in the world.

"You have set Hal Bronstone completely off gear," gushed Alice Fenton, "he had his eyes upon you all the afternoon. To think that he put up such a surprise on Diana, by coming up from Panama in such sudden fashion. I wish his people were home, too. They know how to entertain so lavishly, and it would add so much to the town's galety this summer if they'd open up their big house," and Miss Fenton sighed an exaggerated sigh, for her home was in Sunnyvale and she was to remain there for part of the summer.

"Diana is furlous" remarked Miss Rendeau

"Diana is furious," remarked Miss Rendeau.
"Naturally, with Hal paying such attention to Evelya, tormented Miss Fenton.
"Girls, please." begged Evelyn, toying with her

"It must be because of that gown of yours. It seems his ardor Diamaward has cooled somewhat, but not because of his having met those Panama beauties about whom we teased him, what, but not because of mis naving met those Panama beauties about whom we teased him," said Miss Greer.

"I wonder, did he get back this morning or yesterday?" questioned Miss Secton.
"Why?" came a chorus.
"Can't I ask?" was all the comment Miss Secton made, but somehow the thought of the necklace incident behind the big mansion which was the Bronstone home, occurred to all.
Then as the young master of the place came along, the girls, one by one, melted away, leaving him alone with Evelyn, whose arm he took, and together they stroiled down the linden lined street, until they were well away from the others, chatting pleasantly about nothing in particular until Bronstone suddenly asked:
"What do you intend to do now, Evelyn?"
"Teach," she responded promptly.
"Wherever I can find a position."

"Where?"

"Wherever I can find a position."

"Shall you be sorry to leave Sunnyvale?"

"Yes, very, for I've had many enjoyable days here. In fact," she went on, "I can't think of any very dismal ones."

"Do you remember the night before I left for Panama?"

A burning blush mounted to her cheek. "I do,"
she said, trying to speak lightly. "I'm afraid, though, we flirted outrageously."

ing to hold me off?"

"Hold you off?"

"You know that you did not flirt with me, or at least, I didn't think of it in that light. You were brilliant that night, and it was thea that my heart first knew what love was." He held up his hand for silence, as she attempted to interrupt him, and continued: "I had been more or less attached to Diana Helmont, and so I dared not tell you that I loved you. But after I was away from your magic presence, the fascination of your presence remained, I found out that it was love that I bore you, that you were the only woman I could love. I wrote you several times, but my letters apparently never reached you—"he stopped and looked searchingly into her face.

THE MAN WHO WAS AFRAID

bird flew up, up, its pathway cleaving the sky.

Dan Loring was its brain, its eyes, its hands, controlling, guiding with lightning flashes this thing of power whirling, swooping, curving, lifting, falling, seeking the enemy with a singleness of purpose, carrying human woe into that realm of peace nearer the stars. Dan Loring, who had said, "I could never kill a man, even in battle, no matter who he night be." Dan Loring, straight, lean, strong like fine steel, sitting now in his narrow seat, impelled by a single desire, to meet the enemy and silence him forever.

Ballie deere, to meet the enemy and sheller him forever.

Below circled other ships of war, other birdmen out to win. Dam noted well their shape and course, enemy planes, every one. A slow, grim smile failed to soften his tense face; his keen eyes watched, singled out the nearest foeman, and the firm hands acted. Up, up into the sky sprang firm the war-bird, curved, turned and sped downward with a flash of wings.

with a flash of wings.

Somewhere in the back of Dan's brain there came to him as he swept through the air, a kaleidoscopic review of the path that had led him skyward. War had cast its net of steel over his own little home town, and, with others, he had been drawn therein. Then came the day when he had faced fear, when he had known a soulloathing for the thing he had been asked to do. Back in this strange dual brain of his he remembered, while his real brain was controlling eyes and hands with undeviating purpose. Remembered! Could he ever forget the night just before he left for camp when he went to Mary, his wife, with his trouble?

"I am ready for war," he had told her. "I am the tragic things of the hour, remembrances that had no part in today. How Mary's brave words rang above the whirring plane! "I trust you, Dan. You have never failed me

"I trust you, Dan. You have never failed me yet."

He straightened in his seat; his keen eyes never wavered in their watching.

Quick! A swift dip downward, and—ping! The shot cleft the air, and boomed through great spaces. The enemy plane curved and dropped; righted, and flung itself forward. Dan's lips drew a straighter line. A second ping spoke. A reply whistled close by his ear, and the battle was on, up there in the sky, the blue overhead, serene, undisturbed; hell beneath.

Like two great fighting cocks, the planes pranced and sidestepped, bent and reared, seeking, ever seeking the surest way to destroy. Now and then a sharp ping snapped out; ever the whir of the planes filled the air.

Still that queer half-brain repeated its messages of the past.

sages of the past.
"Like a bairnie twa its mither—"
The great plane swept upward, and flung down its hail of death.

"A wee birdle twa its nest——"

Ah! Only a curve missed that shot. He was not the only one out to do battle, to annihilate, to destroy.

"I can never kill a man, never!" rang through this strange sub-sense. Had he ever said that? He, Dan Loring?

"Ha! I'll show you, you beasts! Take that, you devil, and that! That got you, eh? Hipped you bad, did it? Glad to see you stagger! Come on, come on again! I've more for you if you want it. Come on, you cur!

"'I will repay,' saith the Lord.
"Surely, in His own good time: just now I am His right-hand man. A-h! Curse you! That's my shoulder, you coward. If you think you can get me that way, you are one count short. Just you wait. I can bring this old bird nearer: I can talk lead as well as you.

"Put up a good fight— Keep the faith——"
Strange thoughts rushed through his over-active brain, like wind through the treetops, but his

Fight These Bugs

E need all the food we can raise this year with which to "Fight the Kaiser," but in order to get the food ware under the necessity of fighting the "bugs" first. Here follows a list of bugs that are especially troublesome and which we must be prepared to fight to a finish. To do this we must provide ourselves with the right kind of ammunition and begin shooting as soon as the advance guard appears. If you wait until the first crop has had time to multiply, these enemy insects will have so big an army of reserves that they will win in the end. Fight early and hard and carry the first trenches by all means at hand. For Insects that Eat the Leaves there are two or three kinds of "ammunition" to use—Paris green, arsenate of lead and white hellebore. All these are poisons and must be sprayed or dusted thoroughly over the leaves. Anything that eats the leaves will get the poison. Arsenate of lead is better than Paris green because it does not "burn" the leaves and sticks better to the foliage. White hellebore is used for quick work but does not last long. Pyrethrum powder answers the same purpose.

For Insects that Suck the Sap, kerosene emulsion or sulphate of nicotine should be sprayed on the plants. All these preparations are handled ready-made by dealers and should be applied according to directions that come with the package. Remember that these remedies are not interchangeable. It will do no good to apply the poison sprays for sap-sucking insects, nor will it be of any use to use kerosene emulsion or nicotine for leaf-eating insects. Be sure to shoot the kind of "ammunition" that hits the enemy.

Potato Bugs

Get the first crop early before they have time to lay their eggs on the underside of the leaves, spray with arsenate of lead just about the time that the young beetles hatch. Be sure to get the first brood and you will have little or no trouble with a second

Striped Cucumber Beetles

Plant a trap crop a week or so earlier than the regular crop. As soon as these young plants come up, dust or spray them freely with Paris green. When the regular crop comes on most of the beetles will have been killed off.

Or, cover the hills with a box four inches deep and a foot square over whose bottom has been tacked a wire screen. Keep this over the hills until the rough leaves appear, when the beetles will do no harm.

Cabbage Worms

As soon as these appear dust with Paris green or arsenate of lead or spray with either. Pyrethrum powder dusted over the plant will do quick work.

The Squash Bug

Hand picking is about the only way to control the squash bugs found on the underside of the leaves in the early morning or late evening. The eggs which are also laid on the underside of the leaves, should be picked off and destroyed by pinching off the portion of the leaf to which they are attached.

Asparagus Beetle

The asparagus beetle makes its appearance later in the spring just at about the end of the cutting season. This tiny insect may be best controlled by letting a few stalks here and there along the row go without cutting. It is upon these that the larvæ will first appear. They can then be easily poisoned by the use of Paris green or arsenate of lead. The later plants should be watched and sprayed for this pest.

Success in the complete control of insects this year will very greatly lessen the bother from these pests next year. In fighting these enemies of our war gardens we should always bear in mind the old adage, "A stitch in time saves nine."

Grasshopper

The grasshopper must go, at least he must be held in check if our crops are to come through to harvest with heavy yields.

The poisoned bran bait is the thing with which the job may be done,—so says a new bulletin just off the press of the United States Department of Agriculture. It is made by mixing together 25 pounds of bran, six lemons (or oranges chopped fine, one pound of Paris green and two or three gallons of cheap blackstrap molasses with enough water to make a moist (not sloppy) bran mash. This is scattered over the land infested with hoppers, at the rate of from five to seven pounds per acre.

In moist climates the best time to apply the bait is in early morning. It is sown broadcast by hand as one would sow grain.

by hand as one would sow grain.

Cutworms

The same poisoned bran mash that is used for grasshoppers is also good for cutworms. Cutworms usually do much damage to corn grown on sod land. If the bran mash is scattered between the rows, the best time to apply it is in the evening as soon as the corn begins to show above ground. Cutworms feed at night and the bran if sprinkled in the evening retains its odor and freshness, thus attracting the worms to the best

Sometimes these pests migrate from one field to the next, so that it is only necessary to sprinkle a row of poisoned bram along the side of the field to protect the crop in the adjoining field.

This is the most serious enemy of wheat in some localities. From wheat the bugs pass to the neighboring corn fields as soon as the wheat is harvested. There are three methods of keeping chinch bugs out of corn fields, so says a recent bulletin of the United States Department of ment bulletin is similar to the first except that a furrow is plowed around the wheat field with the dirt thrown toward the field. Post holes are dug along the bottom of the furrow (which is used for the oil or creosote), the same as the wagon track, and the bugs trapped and killed in the same way as by the first method.

3. The third method described consists in plowing a furrow around the field the same as in the second method. Then a log is dragged back and forth along the furrow until a heavy dust is formed from which the bugs find it impossible to extricate themselves. They are the killed by sprinkling with kerosene or by burning them with a torch.

chinch bugs out of corn fields, so says a recent bulletin of the United States Department of Agriculture.

1. Drag a stoneboat or a roller around the infested field until a smooth path is made. Then drive a wagon along so that one wheel track is firmly pressed down in the smooth path made by the stone boat. Fill the wagon track with heavy road oil. Next dig post holes every two rods on the inside of the tar line but just touching it. The bugs will not cross the tar but will crawl along the line and fall into the holes. These holes should be a foot or more deep and when many bugs have fallen in they should be killed with the disease found present was avian (bird).

is quite common in chickens and other poultry. It is contagious and incurable and neves-itates destruction of the affected flock, cleansing, disinfection and whitewashing of the buildings; plowing and seeding of the yards and the most scrupulous attention to the feeding and watering uten sils. Affected birds should be burned. Avian tuberculosis is not, so far as known at the present time, communicable to man, but it can infect swine and that explains why hogs sometimes have the disease although not fed factory milk, or the milk from home cows affected with tuberculosis. Hogs will kill and eat chickens now and then, and if the birds have tuberculosis it may, in that way, be communicated to the hogs. Tuberculosis of swine is very common and when discovered suggests that the home dairy herd should be tested with tuberculin and that bought milk should be pasturized. We should make sure, too, that the poultry on the farm is free from tuberculosis. Why harbor any animal that has the disease? Affected animals do not thrive and are a menace to people. Infected poultry also prove profitless. Circular No. 99 of the Wisconsin agricultural experiment at Madison deals with avian tuberculosis, illustrates the subject well and gives good advice as to prevention and eradication.

Brown Corn Smurs.—Please give the treatment of broom corn seed to prevent smut—what kind of solution and how to apply it? Will it do to apply the treatment in freezing weather?

Mrs. O. T., Casey, Ill.

A.—There are three kinds of smuts that attack broom corn. Two can be controlled by the usual formaldehyde treatment—soaking the seed ten minutes in a solution composed of one pint of formaldehyde in forty gallons of water; then carefully drying the seed. Of course the seed must not be subjected to freezing temperature until thoroughly dry.

If You Are A Woman Who Loves Crochet And Tatting Here Is A Set Of Books You Will Be Delighted To Own!

Of Books You Will Be Delighted To Own!

A TY ONE of these books alone is a veritable treasure house of the newest, most beautiful designs. The seven books combined form a complete library in which you will find any pattern in crocheting and tatting you could possibly ask for. You will fairly revel in the many handsome designs shown. There are edgings, beadings, insertions and laces for every conceivable use. The illustrations are actual photographs of the finished work and show every thread so plainly that they are almost as good to work from as the directions themselves. The directions are adapted for either beginner or expert. They tell stitch by stitch how each pattern is worked, also the quantity and size of material required and the correct sizes of hooks to be used. Following is a description of each book. They are 8 by 10 1-2 inches in size with the exception of You'me I which is 9 1-4 by 12 inches. Please order by numbers.

Volume 1 Crocheted yokes for combinations, envelopes, nightgowns, corset covers, etc.—fifteen all different, exquisite designs.

Volume 2 Handsome crocheted edgings and insertions suitable for handker-chiefs, underwear, dresses and a multitude of other uses,—thirty-three different designs.

Volume 3 Eighteem lovely designs in Cluny insertions and laces for center-pieces, library scarfs, boudoir caps, corset cover yokes, piano scarfs, ourtains, chemises, envelopes or combination suits.

Volume 4 Twenty-five handsome designs in caps, candle shades, baby bonnets, bedspreads, doilies, library scarfs, pillows, centerpieces, portiere, medallions, curtains, etc., etc.

Volume 5 Twenty-five designs in novelty and clover leaf crocheted yokes, primrose and sunflower yokes; doilles, centerpieces, boudoir caps unique edges and insertions for serving trays; novelty aprons and collars.

Volume 6 Thirty-two designs in tatting, and beautiful assortment of tatted handkerchief edges, edgings and insertions, tatted yokes, boudoir caps, towel edges, medallions; yokes, breakfast caps, centerpieces, edgings and lace in Maltese crochet and yokes in Irish crochet.

Volume 7 Thirty handsome novelty crocheted designs including rose, sunflower periwinkle, and Venetian yokes; boudoir caps, monkey face library scart, and lace pillow; large and small baskets, hat pin holder, jewel box, vanity tray coin purse, utility bag, starfish doily, pineapple centerpiece; edgings and insertions in pillow lace; daisy edging; spider, bell, rick-rack, novelty and coronation braid laces.

WE advise you to order all seven of these splendid books before the assortment is broken. If however you do not care for the whole library at this time we have arranged the following special offers which give you the opportunity to secure any two or any four or the entire seven books. A PENNSYLVANIA GIEL, Luthersburg, Penn.—Our advice would be to not promise to marry a soldier that you have never seen. You would not have to ask this question if you had not done so foolish and wrong a thing as to open a correspondence with a man you had never heard of before. (2) There should be no kissing before becoming engaged, and certainly, therefore, no board of the pendent of the first time. Do not cheapen yourself in this way. The boys will respect you all the more for making them behave themselves. themselves.

L. F., Webster City, Ia.—You might give something a leather to the young man to whom you are engaged, I. F., Webser City, in.—100 might give something in leather to the young man to whom you are engaged, if you wish to make him a gift upon his graduation. A bill-fold, or a card-case, bearing his initials, would be appropriate. And there is nothing better than a good book—selecting something you know he would like. (2) The invitation to visit at your fiance's home should come from his mother, and he may tell her to ask you.

M. R. AND J. S., Fort Worth, Tex.—Where are the mothers of the Lone Star State when infants of twelve and thirteen are writing about going car riding at night, and kissing young men of twenty? Is there no one to teach these girls better? Such a letter is disgraceful.

M. M., Louisville, Ky.—A gentleman is always in-roduced to a lady, and the lady's name must be men-loned first in the introduction.

D. H., Albany, Ala.—We think you are wise in post-poning your marriage until your fiance returns from service for Uncle Sam. You may kiss this young man good by when he leaves you, and your parents should not object to such a leave-taking. But it would not be right for you to "go" with another young man while your fiance is absent.

Texas Belles, Hemphill, Tex.—You will always find boys who will steal kisses from you and hold your hands if you give them the chance. But remember a man will respect a girl more who does not make herself cheap and easy, and these signs of affection should be saved until you are engaged to a man to whom you have the right to give them, and who has the right to expect them from you. Promiscuous love-making is silly and harmful.

C. McK., Curran, Mich.—It is an immemorial right of woman to throw a man over and refuse to marry him. You can safely do this, if you wish, although it is not a nice thing to do, and we are sure your lover will be justly angry. Yet it is infinitely better to have this difficulty than to marry one man when you love another better. We think the real trouble is that at seventeen you do not know your own mind. Do not marry anybody for three years, and you will be happier afterwards. And we would not join the Rebeccas yet, either.

W. G. O. K., Kalwa, Mich.—You may go to boy and girl parties in your neighborhood, if your parents do not object. (2) You may write to friends who are serving in the army, but remember you are but school girls, and there should be no foolish love correspondence.

Y. G., Tahlequah, Okla.—Certainly your brother may accompany you and the man you intend to marry wherever and whenever you wish to make him an addition to your party.

BLUE EYES, Bluff, Tex.—Etiquette prescribes nothing but a prompt and smart spanking in the case of a girl of fourteen who is "in love with a gentleman of thirty." You should never allow this man to kiss you as you say he does, and we think that you are badly in need of counsel from your mother or some other woman.

L. R., Marmaduke, Ark.-There should be no kissing L. R., Marmaduke, Ark.—There should be no kissing before becoming engaged, and a fifteen-year-old girl is much too young to talk about marrying. Tell this boy that he must wait until you are both older, and until you have had an opportunity to get an education. Your spelling is disgraceful. There is plenty of time for marriage, but only a few years in which to learn the things necessary to make the kind of a wife a man wishes to marry. Other fifteen- and sixteen-year-old girls, please take notice.

JAOK, Chandlers, Tenn.—Of course it is not right for you to correspond with a young man when your mother has forbidden it. Girls of sixteen who act in this way should be spanked—especially when they talk about marrying a young man of twenty-one or any other age.

LAUGHING MASK, Grangeville, Idaho.—Yes, you may write a note to the girl asking if you may call.

J. B., Charlotte, N. C.—We wish that all of the foolish girls that write to this department regarding getting married at sixteen could read your unhappy letter. You were too young to know your own mind, or the mistake of becoming the wife of a man so many years older than yourself. If your husband is openly cruel to you, and you are capable, as you state, of earning your own living by dressmaking, a separation might be the best solution of your troubles. On account of your children, act carefully. But there is no reason why you and your two small children—and the one to come—should submit to brutal treatment and live in misery. one to come-live in misery.

encyclopedia, which embraces all human knowledge in concentrated form, but they just won't do it. All the terrific struggles we have had to educate people as to the issues involved in this war, and the vital necessity of crushing the German oligarchy before it crushes us, is all due to the fact that people read little and think less. And yet publishers daily, weekly and monthly search the world for news at terrific expense to themselves and place before the public at little cost in the most enticing manner, news and facts more necessary to them than food and for the lack of which they are practically dying on their feet and inviting annihilation because they are indifferent to anything but local matters and scorn to acquaint themselves with the tremendous world events which are going on about them, events in which their very lives are concerned and which are deciding the destinies of nations for ages to come. Another trouble arises with those who read,—they read only those things which agree with their viewpoint of life and so they get single-track minds. have two miles to walk. My teacher's name is Myrtie Nash. I like her fine. I desk with my sister. We are in the seventh grade. We have nine studies a day. They are spelling reading, arithmetic, English, domestic science, geography, history and drawing. In the summer I take music lessons. I am fourteen years old. I live in the country, milk cows and wash dishes. In the summer I work out of doors. I like to read books. My favorite books are "The Lass Of The Silver Sword," "To Have And To Hold," and "The Little Colonel." With best wishes to you and the cousins. Your niece, Little Colonel." With best wishes to you and the cousins. Your niece,

So, Elsie, you are going to school near a villiage, are you? And what, pray, is a villiage? Make it a village, please, next time. So you "desk with sister." When I first read that somewhat illegibly written sentence, I thought you meant you dressed with sister, and had visions of a little white room, decorated with cretonne and pink bows, where you and sister roomed. I note, however, you wish to inform us that you and your sister are desk mates. So one of your nine studies is spelling reading. Spelling reading must be something of an innovation. Anything however, that improves spelling and inspires one with a desire to read books, looks mighty good to me. Domestic science should be taught to every child, but it will take a lot of science for this country to feed the hungry millions who must be fed here and abroad unless we want the Kaiser in the White House and the descendants of the Pilgrim and Puritan converted into fertilizer to produce hops and grain for German breweries, bologna ranches and frankfurter farms. I regret to hear, Elsie, that you take your music lessons in summer time. These lessons should always be taken in the winter, when the windows can be kept closed. "The Silver Sword," "To Have and To Hold," and "The Little Colonel," it seems to me, would make an excellent library for the Kaiser, who eats his soup with a sword, fancies himself a reincarnated Napoleon and intends to have and to hold the earth and all that is on it unless we break his military power. If we are to win this war, the South will have to raise enough food for its own needs as well as enough cotton for the world's clothing. I hope, my dear, you will help all you possibly can.

WEAVERVILLE, N. C. Box 49.

DEAR SIR:

I have heard that you write debates on any subject for one dollar each. If that is so please notify me at once and I will have you write me on the negative side of Military Training.

Your nephew,
HUGH LEFLER.

side of Military Training.

You are quite wrong, Hugh, in thinking that I write debates on any subject for one dollar each. To turn out a worth-while matter of this kind—and I do not care to foist junk on a suffering public—would take possibly two days and would cost me from ten to twenty times the generous sum you proffer. People wonder why we have war, famine, pestilence and hell generally the world over. It is all due to the fact that though people are ready to spend eight dollars for a pair of leather shoes made of paper, they have not reached that stage where they realize that brain and mind products have any value whatsoever. They visualize the shoemaker living in a palace with seventy automobiles at his disposal, while the poet and author live in a garret on ten cents a day and beat it when the landlady calls for the rent. When people put brains before boots, mind before matter, we will have a civilized, worth-while world and not before. Hugh, my boy, if you offered me a billion dollars I would not write you any matter that would help you to prove that military training was unnecessary. Such a debate at the present time, when the Kaiser is tearing the bowels out of Europe, threatening every American home and every American woman and child and the very existence of our nation and of liberty and democracy the world over is in execrable taste. The Kaiser keeps a lot of paid agents in this country, who will tell you that it is a crime to arm yourself or defend your country, and that pacifism and unpreparedness are the only virtues. Before Germany fights a nation, she sends her agents to lie, spy and buy, to spread discontent, to set class against class, to talk about the beauties of peace and the wickedness of war, and then when she has a nation helpless, she springs upon it as she did upon Russia, like a tiger and tears it to pieces, appropriates its country and makes slaves and cannon fodder of the poor simps and nuts and sentimentalist sapheads she has so easily duped. The Kaiser will write you the matter

DEATH OF HORRE.—Will equal parts of copperas, sait and sait-peter injure a horse's stomach, when given for worms according to directions? I had a mare and gave her the treatment and she died.

A.—The mixture of copperas, sait and sulphur is perfectly safe for a horse that is infested with worms but otherwise healthy. That or any other medicine might aggravate a diseased condition such as apparently was present in this case, and you should have opened the mare to determine the nature of the disease present. Thousands of horses have taken the worm medicine prescribed here without causing any disturbance other than that to the worms. Copperas is not indicated in chronic indignation, but would not be likely to cause fatal results even in that disease.

Cough.—Can you tell me what makes my Jersey fatal results even in that disease.

COUGH.—Can you tell me what makes my Jersey cow cough and what I can do for her? It is just one short cough at a time, now and then. She came fresh last February and gives twelve quarts of milk a day. She is two years old, eats good, plays and runs when let out.

MRS. A. E. S.

A.—Cough merely is a symptom of irritation which may be due to one or other of a large number of causes, but in the case of a cow the tuberculin test always should be applied, as tuberculous may be present, and that necessitates destruction of the animal. Meanwhile it would be best not to use the milk.

GARGET.—I have a cow five years old. She was

mal. Meanwhile it would be best not to use the milk.

GARGET.—I have a cow five years old. She was fresh hast spring for the third time. After her calf was a few weeks old she gave lumpy milk out of the left back teat. Her udder on that side would be swollen and hard in the evening and the next morning the milk would be lumpy, and she wouldn't give as much milk from that teat for several days. What is the cause and what will cure her?

A.—The cow has slight attacks of garget (mammits) from indigestion, chill, bruise, irregular, incomplete or rough milking, sudden change of feed, overfeeding on protein-rich feed, or some such cause. Prevent such causes. Milk every three hours at times of attack, give a physic and cut down rich feed.

WARTS.—My mule, four years old has a wart on attack, give a physic and cut down rich feed.

WARTS.—My mule, four years old, has a wert on her eyelid and one on her hind leg just below the hock joint on front side of leg, also one coming just below the trace line on front shoulder. Please give remedy to cure the present warts and one to prevent others coming.

MRS. G. Mcli.

A.—We know of no preventive of warts. Rub old dry salammoniac into the wart that bleeds, and repeat when required. Have the wart on the shoulder dissected out by a surgeon; he may also be able to remove the one on the eyelid. If it has a narrow neck, tie a fine cord daily about it, and once daily wet it with vinegar.

ABNORMAL UDDER.—Will you please give me advice about my cow. I bought her a short time ago, and find she gives two thirds of her milk out of one side of her udder. Is there anything I can do to prevent this?

of her udder. Is there anything 1 can do to pre-vent this?

A.—The cow probably has had an attack of garget (mammitis) or several of them, and if that is the case will be likely to have more of them until her udder is ruined for dairying. Massage the affected quarters thoroughly three times a day and strip clean. At night rub them with brandy.

Information there times a may am surje deam.

Inght rub them with brandy.

LAMENESS.—I have a horse that appears to be road foundered. When he gets up, after lying down, he is lame in his fore feet; they seem to be numb, and for a while, he can hardly walk, and when driving on a hard road he limps and stumbles. I have been told that he had side-bones on his left hind foot. Two small knots, like gristle, have formed about an inch above the hoof.

A.—Side-bone is a lateral cartilage (or gristle) turned to bone. If founder is present, the fore fret will be thrust out in front of the body and the hind ones correspondingly advanced when the horse starts to walk. Also the animal will tend to walk on its heels. If these are the facts, put on flat, thin-heeled har shoes over pine tar, oakum and thick leather pads. Then clip the hair from the hoof-heads of both fore feet and blister them several times at intervals of two or three weeks. Blister one at a time.

Stiffness.—I have an eleven-year-old mule that MOON BLINDNESS.—I have a horse nine years old that has a moon eye. She is a good traveler, but holds her head to one side. Is there any remedy? R. T. R.

A.—Periodic ophthalmia (moon blindness) causes cattact and blindness after repeated attacks and the disease is incurable. If the mare has had but one or two attacks, blindness may be retarded by giving her a dram of iodide of potash twice daily in feed or water at time of attack and at such time keeping the eyes covered with a soft cloth to be kept wet with a saturated solution of boric acid rated solution of boric acid

FIRTULA.—Can you tell me what I can do for my young horse's fistula? The veterinarian here said that the fistula is so deep it could not be cured. J. D. C.

A.—You should have described the condition present, but if the pus has burrowed and caused sinuses (pipes) to form behind the shoulder blades, the case may prove incurable. Your veterinarian might care to try the new army treatment of injecting concentrated lye into the sinuses after perfect cleansing and removal of pus and dead tissues and free application of lard or vaseline to the skin around and below all of the openings. Packing the cavities with bismuth paste also is good treatment in such cases and has the great advantage of being painless.

The recital of so much that had been true in her past life seemed to have stirred up all the bile in the woman's nature and she dropped all semblance of affection or kindness toward her whom she had so lately claimed as her child. Sibyl started as if in pain, and her lips quivered in a grieved way. But she answered, quietly and steadily:

"I am coming to you immediately mother"

"I am coming to you immediately, mother."

"Do you expect they will be willing to let you come?"

"They will not hinder me from doing what I know to be right."

"How do you suppose we're going to live? Will they help us, do you think?" Mrs. Stillman asked, with a greedy, anxious glitter of her eye. Involuntarily, Sibyl's lip curled.

She had not thought of such a thing, and a feeling of scorn and almost disgust seized her at the bare suggestion of anything of the kind. But she only answered:

"There will be some way provided, never fear. I am young and strong, and can teach or work. But we will talk of this another time."

"Yes, yes; you had better go home now, and tell them about it, so as to make your arrangements and get settled as soon as possible." the woman said, anxious to be alone once more.

How the word startled Sibyl into a sense of her misery once more!

Her beautiful home was to her home no more. The tender love and care which had sheltered her for so many years, must now drop away, from her, and she would have to face the great cold world, and this trial, alone.

And this new blessedness that had come to her so recently. Ah! dear Heaven! how could she bear it?

Raymond could never be anything to her now. His dear love must be put aside; she was no

Raymond could never be anything to her now. His dear love must be put aside; she was no longer worthy of it; she was a nameless child, a dishonored daughter, and she could never bring disgrace upon him; he must never link his life to her shame.

She staggered to her feet, looking more like some specter from another world than the bright, beautiful girl who had entered that room so happy and free from care but yesterday.

With hands that shook like leaves in the wind, she fastened her clock about her, but on her hat with names that shook like leaves in the wind, she fastened her closk about her, put on her hat, and tied her veil close over her face.

"Yes, I will go home," she answered, with her bloodless lips; "but I shall come again soon—and to stay."

CHAPTER XXII.

"I CANNOT GIVE YOU UP."

"I CANNOT GIVE YOU UP."

She met Raymond on the stairs.
He had become anxious at her prolonged absence, and, rememberfing her illness and agitation of the previous day, had driven to Algeria street, himself to take her home.
Even through the thick folds of her veil, he noticed the deathly hue of her face, and the heartbroken, despairing look in her eyes.

"My dearest, you are ill again—what is it?" he cried, springing to her side, and putting his arm around her, lest she should fall.

All her forced calmness gave way at the sight of him, and the sound of his tender words.
It all came to her with such terrible, crushing force, as she looked into his dear face—the great sacrifice that would rend her very soul.
How could she give him up—this kingly man, who had become her heart's idol, her one love?

"Oh, Ray! Ray! take me home quick—quick!" she gasped.

mind was crazed.

He laid her gently down, and arose from his kneeling posture, though she clung to him and begged him not to leave her; she could not lose

In less than three minutes, however, he was back again, bearing in his hands a crystal cup, containing a dark-colored liquid.

He put it to her muttering lips.
"Drink it, Sibyl!" he commanded, in a tone that he had never used in her presence before.

With her eyes fixed hungrily on his face, she obeyed; and, setting the cup aside, he took her again into his arms, and held her firmly there until the white, heavy lids at last dropped over her dark eyes, shutting their misery from his sight, and she slept upon his breast.

After a while he laid her gently back upon the couch, and, covering her with a warm shawl, he sat down beside her to watch until she should awake, wondering what fearful thing could have happened to have so unsettled her usually well-balanced mind.

Fortunately, Lady Prescott had gone out of town for the day, and would not be back until late, a circumstance for which he was very thankful, as he desired to discover the secret of Sibyl's misery before any one else should see her.

With anxious brow, and more anxious heart, he kept his station beside her for two long hours.

He feared that when she awoke it would be only to rave more wildly than before in the grasp of some fell disease which she had contracted upon her missions of mercy.

"She shall never go there again," he muttered, with stern emphasis, to himself.

Ah! he little knew what was to come, and how powerless he would be to prevent it.

As soon as the effects of the opiate began to wear away, Sibyl grew restless, and finally awoke.

Niowly her eyes unclosed and rested upon Raymond.

He smiled, bent forward, and kissed her lips, saving gently:

"I do not believe it," he said, with stern scorn, when she had finished, but in his heart he felt that every word was true.

"It seems too dreadful to believe, Ray—we both can see that it is all true, and now only one thing remains to be done," Sibyl said, with a shudder.

"And that?" he cried, sharply.

"I must go where I belong."

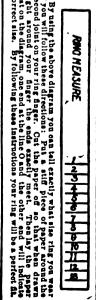

"Where you belong? Sibyl you belong to me

"And that?" he cried, sharply.
"I must go where I belong."
"Where you belong? Sibyl, you belong to me now—you have given yourself to me—you are to be my wife."
"No, Ray, not now," she answered, looking as if she would die beneath the stroke, yet speaking clearly and firmly.
"You cannot mean what you say, Sibyl! You shall be my wife!" he cried, hoarsely, and almost crushing the hands he held, in the mad torture of the moment.
"Ah! dear, how hard you are making it for me! You cannot know how I would love to be your wife—you can sever dream what I am giving up in yielding this hope," she murmured, brokenly.
"Do I not know by the pain in my own heart, when you talk of going away from me?"
"Ah, but I love you too well ever to bring such a shame upon you."
"Shame! What shame?" he demanded, with scorn. You can bring nothing but honor and glory upon me. I will never give you up!"
"But I shall have to go, nevertheless," she said, with anguish in her eyes.
"You have given me your promise—I will never give it back to you!" Raymond returned, almost fiercely.

"I shall have to take it back, then, myself, Ray," she answered, growing calmer as he grew excited, "and, dear, it must all be settled now between us, for I shall not have strength to argue it again with you. I have no name but one of shame to come to you with; I have no dowry but dishonor to bring you. This woman, who is my mother, is alone in the world, sick and needy, and duty tells me to go to her—I must do my duty, Ray."

Fund, even if we send only a dime. Remember that Uncle Charlie may not always be with us, so let's show our appreciation before it is too late.

How many COMFORT sisters are White Ribboners? I belong to the Lowville Union, being at present the Treasurer. I don't believe there is another organization in the word that does so much good with so little money as the W. C. T. U. I know there are many against it but in spite of all we are each year marching on to greater victories. We had the satisfaction last election of seeing Lowville "bone dry," something which never happened before; also nearly all of Lewis County went dry, so we feel quite encouraged. Before I close allow me to quote one of my favorite verses, which is:

"Out of the hurt may be born a smile,
Out of the blow a kiss;
Somewhere the sun shines all the while
Could we but remember this.
Out of my tears may a rainbow shine,
Out of my struggle rest,
Somewhere God's hand reacheth down to mine,
Giving me what is best." Giving me what is best.'

I would like to hear from the sisters and will answer all I receive.

FLUSHING. MICH. DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL COMFORT SISTER

FLUSHING, MICH.

Dear Mrs. Wilkinson and All Comfort Sisters:

I have been listening to your very interesting little discussions for some time, and now, with your permission, I wish a word.

I always believe in "sticking up for the under dog," so to speak, so a word in defense of the little wife who left her husband because she did not love him and has so far strayed from the paths of rectitude as to fall in love with somebody else. Now while I do not approve of her conduct, and such conduct might be considered unseemly from an outsider's standpoint, I believe in being lenient. Who knows what her youth and environment had been. Possibly an unhappy home and the lovable traits and longings dear to every girl's heart, crushed out, and the life embittered, until late in life came the knowledge that mere food and raiment did not mean as much as the heart hunger for affection, that would not be stifled—then she thought it wiser to leave home than live a life of deception. I think though it would be better for her to return to her husband and try to love him as he deserves, for it seems he is kind and true and the protection of a kind husband is worth a great deal. Talk about your wheatless days and your meatless days, and so on, they are nearly all meatless at our house. We have meat usually about once a week. I will tell you what I am cooking for dinner and how I am going to cook it. It is very simple but perhaps will help out some new housewife.

First, baked potatoes. I wash them thoroughly, wipe and then cover them over with a bit of lard or meat fryings. They are much nicer that way.

Next, onion gravy. Put a little fat into frying pan, into this slice two medium-sized onions, and fry. Add water and flour thickening, as usual.

Then I have steamed corn bread, made as follows: One tablespoonful of lard, one third cup of milk, four tablespoonful of molasses, one cup of yellow corn meal, two tablespoonfuls of wheat flour and one half teaspoonful of sait. Steam two hours and then place in oven twenty minutes before

The following poems have been requested by readers of COMFORT and sent for publication.

Life's Mirror

There are loyal hearts, there are spirits brave, There are souls that are pure and true; Then give to the world the best you have And the best will come back to you.

Give love, and love to your life will flow, A strength in your utmost need; Have faith, and a score of hearts will show Their faith in your word and deed.

Give truth and your gift will be paid in kind, And honor will honor meet; And a smile that is sweet will surely find A smile that is just as sweet.

For life is the mirror of king and slave,

"Tis just what we are and do,
Then give to the world the best you have,
And the best will come back to you.

—Madeline S. Bridges.

The Soldier's Dream

Our bugles sang truce as the night cloud had lowered, Ass the sentinel star sets its watch in the sky, Where thousands had sunk on the ground overpowered, The weary to sleep and the wounded to die,

Whilst reposing that night on my pallet of straw, 'Neath the wolf-scaring faggot, that guarded slain,

At the dead of the night a sweet vision I saw,
And twice e'er the morning I dreamt it again.

Methought from the battlefield's dreadful array, Far, far I had roamed, on a desolate track, Where, autumn and sunshine, arose on the way, The land of my fathers had welcomed me back.

I flew to the pleasant fields oft traversed across, In life's morning light, when my bosom was young, I heard my own mountain goats bleating aloft, And I knew the sweet strain that the corn reapers

They pledged me with wine cups, and fondly I swore, From the home of my weeping friends never to part, My little ones kissed me a thousand times o'er. And my wife sobbed aloud with the fullness of heart.

Stay, stay with us, rest, thou art weary and worn, And fain was their war-worn soldier to stay, But sorrow returned at the dawning of morn, When the voice in my dreaming ear melted away.

—Thomas Campbell.

you retract the confession you made yesterday in the summer house—"
"How shall I extricate myself?" she half murmed, filled with happiness and yet feeling like a brazen creature. "How shameless it was—"
"No, it was the confession of a true heart. You have a choice of two futures, Evelyn, one pointed out by your class prophet—extremely true, one bound to bring a certain independence, but humdrum at best. The other is the prophecy of a Gipsy maid, full of happiness and honor and love. Do you care to accept the latter, do you care to take me to your heart and shift the met, which will be a burden of love, and give me the joy of taking care of you? Ah, say what they may, it is a man's mission to labor for the one he loves, and so shall I if you'll but let me."

Where Are the Wicked Folks Buried?

"Tell me, gray-headed-sexton," I said,
"Where in this field are the wicked folk laid?"
"I have wandered the quiet old graveyard through,
And studied the epitaphs, old and new;
But on monument, obelisk, pillar or stone,
I read of no evil that men have done."

The old sexton stood by a grave newly made, With his chin on his hand, his hand on his spade. I knew by the gleam of his eloquent eye That his heart was instructing his lips to reply.

"Who is to judge when the soul takes its flight? Who is to judge 'twixt the wrong and the right? Which of us mortals shall dare to say That our neighbor was wicked who died today?

"In the journey through life, the farther we speed, The better we learn that humanity's need Is charity's spirit, that prompts us to find Rather virtue than vice in the lives of mankind.

"So commendable deeds we record on these stones; The evil men do—let it die with their bones. I have labored as sexton for many a year, But I never have buried a wicked man here."

After I had worn my new sweater a few times it began to stretch crosswise and get shorter proportionally. I was discouraged until I hit upon the plan of crycheting a chain on the inside. Remedies Coughs may be relieved by glycerine and lime juice taken at night, before retiring. The glycerine should be diluted.

For ivy poisoning, paint the affected parts with strong wood lye. Let it stay on a moment and then wash off with lukewarm water. When dry, rub with vaseline

For burns or scalds, apply cloths well saturated with cool alum water, keeping the air from the injured parts. Scraped potato or white of an egg also gives relief.

REMEDY FOR BOILS.—Take one half cup corn meal, fill cup with hot water, not quite boiling, stir thoroughly. Let settle a few minutes and drink. Do this three times a day until boils disappear.

Physicians Explain Why Women Need More Iron in Their Blood Today Than 30 Years Ago

Say Anaemia-Lack of Iron is Greatest Curse to the Health, Strength, Vitality and Beauty of the Modern American Woman

Dr. Ferdinand King, New York Physician and Medical Author, says physicians should prescribe more organic iron—Nux= ated Iron—to supply the iron deficiency. Opinions of Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly Physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), New York, and the Westchester County Hospital; Dr. A. J. Newman, former Police Surgeon of Chicago, and other physicians who have thoroughly tested the value of Nuxated Iron.

Any woman who tires easily, is nervous or Irritable, or looks pale, haggard, and worn, should at once have her blood examined for iron deficiency-administration of simple Nuxated Iron will often increase the strength and endurance of weak, nervous, careworn women in two weeks'

"There can be no strong, healthy, beautiful, rosy-cheeked women without iron," says Dr. Ferdinand King, a New York Physician and Medical Author. "I have strongly emphasized the fact that doctors should prescribe more organic iron-Nuxated Iron-for their nervous, run-down, weak, haggard-looking women patients. Paller means anemia. The skin of an anemic woman is pale, the flesh flabby. The muscles lack tone, the brain fags, and the memory fails, and often they become weak, nervous, irritable, despondent and melancholy. When the iron goes from the blood of women the roses go from their cheeks.

"In the most common foods of America, the starches, sugars, table syrups, candies, polished Chicago, and former House Surgeon, Jefferson Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly Physics Park Hospital, Chicago, says: "It has been my particular duty during the past six years to assist in keeping Chicago's five thousand bluecoats in good health and perfect fighting trim, so that sands of persons go on suffering year after year, they would be physically equipped to withstand all doctoring themselves for all kinds of ills, when manner of storms and ravages of nature's ele- the real and true cause underlying their condiments. "Mother, why don't you take Nuxated Iron and be strong and well and have nice rosy cheeks instead of being so nervous and irritable all the time and looking so haggard and old-The doctor gave some to Susie Smith's mother and she was worse off than you are and now she looks years younger and feels just fine."

Then test your strength again Refining processes have removed the iron of Mother Earth from these impoverished foods, and silly methods of home cookery, by throwing down the waste pipe the water in which our vegetables are cooked, are responsible for another grave iron loss. Therefore, you should supply the iron deficiency in your food by using some form of organic iron, just as you would use salt when your food has not enough salt."

Nuxated Iron so potent in nervous, run-down condition for nervous, run-down condition to ward alcoholic beverages, there are probably thousands who might readily build up their red blood sands who might readily build up their red blood than was the case twenty or thirty years alone to physicians, is not a condition to ward off the mileton of themselves into a condition to ward off the mileton or products it is into a condition to ward off the mileton or themselves with habit-forming drugs, stimulants and alcoholic beverages, there are probably thousands who might readily build up their red blood corpuscies, increase their physical energy and get themselves into a condition to ward off the mileton or products it is it is surprising how many people some form of organic iron, just as you would use salt when your food has not enough salt."

Sworn Statement of Composition on its Formula

The Board of Directors have authorized the broadest publication of the sworn statement of the composition of Nuxated Iron, so that the public may examine it for themselves and judge as to its merits. Newspapers everywhere are invited to copy this statement for the benefit of their readers. It is suggested that physicians make a record of it and keep it in their offices so that they may intelligently answer questions of patients concerning it. Everybody is advised to cut it out and keep it. A copy of the actual sworn statement will be sent to any one who desires such. It is as follows:

Iron Peptonate (Special specific Standard) Quantity given below. Sodium Gleyerophosphates U.S.P. Cascarin Bitter. Magnesium Carbonate. Po. Ginger U.S.P. (Monsanto.) P. E. Nux Vomica U.S.P. Cascarin Bitter. Magnesium Carbonate. Po. Ginger U.S.P. Oil Cassia Cinnamon U.S.P. Calcium Carbonate Precip. U.S.P. Each dose of two tablets of Nuxated Iron contains one and one-half grains of organic iron in the form of iron peptonate of a special specific standard which in our opinion possesses superior qualities to any other known form of iron. By using other makes of Iron Peptonate we could have put the same quantity of actual iron in the tablets at less than one-fourth of the cost to us, and by using metallic iron we could have accomplished the same thing at less than one-twelfth the cost; but by so doing we must have most certainly impaired their therapeutic efficacy. Glycerophosphates used in Nuxated Iron is one of the most expensive tonic ingredients known. It is especially recommended to build up the nerve force and thereby increase brain power, as glycerophosphates used in Nuxated Iron is one of the most expensive tonic ingredients known. It is especially recommended to build up the nerve force and thereby increase brain power, as glycerophosphates in read in Nuxated Iron (Iron Peptonate and Glycerophosphates) are very expensive products as companed with most other tonics.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

Mrs. T. B. M., Crockett, Texas.—Epsom salts baths will not reduce the weight alone. It must be used in connection with other things. The sâlts can be used twice a week in pound quantities—each bath. In this connection might be mentioned a diet of skimmed milk. On alternate days use one quart of skimmed milk. Only, in divided quantities. One glass in the morning, one at noon, one at four o'clock and the last one at night. You must also exercise moderately, eat sparingly of sugar in any form and of course avoid pastries of all kinds.

S. J., Texline, Texas.—Bleeding piles can only be cured by operation—clamp and cautery. This is a simple procedure and can be done by your local physician, and you will be relieved of the condition, cause, etc.

cause, etc.

Miss E. J., Danville, Wåsh.—You should have your teeth carefully cleaned, tonsils removed, if necessary, and take a good cathartic. A good antiacid mouth wash is Dobell's solution. Use full strength.

Mrs. A. C., Oakland, Cat.—You may be getting some disease of the kidneys. Diabetes is one of the causes of becoming fat suddenly. Have your urine examined by the local chemist, and report further.

MRS. E. Z. T., Canuto, Okla.—The use of a one to ten thousand solution of bichloride of mercury will remove the brown spots from the face. This, however, must be used with care and only on the prescription and advice of a physician. The trouble or cause of the trouble is some error of nutrition due to your condition.

Mrs. C. D. T., Cincinnati, Ohio.—This is a nervous manifestation only, and must be controlled or cured by the constant contact with society.

the constant contact with society.

Miss R. H., San Franciseo, Cal.—The cause of your neuritis must be got at before any remedy can be suggested. Many cases of neuritis are not neuritis at all in the last analysis, but some dislocated muscle or bone that can be remedied only by replacement or operation. The lime juice will do no harm. Better drink a hot lemon juice tea one hour before breakfast.

Mrs. H. M., Echley, Colo.—Your blood is out of order, and the spots you refer to are, no doubt, slight hemorrhages under the skin. You should take a good iron tonic.

Mrs. B. H., Granite Falls, Wash.—High blood-pressure may be due to the excessive use of food, stimulants, lack of exercise, not drinking water enough to flush out the kidneys, and to some blood disease, or all combined.

ALBERT P., Atlanta Ga.—The chief and only way of diagnosing the presence of tapeworm is by examining the discharges and finding portions of the worm in the feces. Fasting, the use of castor oil, and this followed by male fern will, in most cases, cure the trouble. The male fern should only be taken on prescription of some reliable physician.

MRS. L. W., McArthur, Ohio.—A cystic tumor is a watery tumor, and usually connected with the ovaries in women. Operation is indicated.

Miss S. J., Larsen, Wis.—The climate is undoubtedly at fault. You have a condition of the mucous membrane allied to the so-called hay-fever.

MRS. P. E., Hobart, Okla.—You may have malaria due to the climate you are living in. This will also cause the gloomy mental condition you refer to. Try change of climate and surroundings.

MISS M. J., Bark River, Mich.—The pain low down in the back is probably due to some uterine displacement. Better have an examination by your local physician and get at the cause cian and get at the cause.

MRS. H. G. S., Basco, III.—Night terrors in children are due to some local irritation. Pin worms, lumbricoid worms, elongated foreskin, undigested food, etc., are among many causes of this trouble.

O. O., Sauk Center, Minn.—Bed-wetting, and its cure, has been referred to many times in Comfort. See answer to next question.

E. H. Lyong, Kans.—Patnitzin orteast used have

E. H., Lyons, Kans.—Petuitrin extract, used hypodermically by the family physician, is the one best guess for the condition mentioned—"bed-wetting."

D. F., Lemoore, Cal.—The "hard knots" on your neck are no doubt little lymphatic tumors. They can be painted twice a week with lodine tincture, or be operated on—the latter preferred.

Mrs. J. T. L., Bonnersferry, Idaho.—From your history, you seem to be suffering from some severe stomachic condition. Probably ulcer of the stomach. You should consult some good surgeon, have an x-ray made of the intestinal tract, and if anything points to ulcer or cancer, have a radical operation.

MISS A. S., Abie, Nebr.—Your trouble is probably progressive muscular atrophy. Massage, electricity and proper food and exercise is all that can be suggested in your case.

m your case.

Mrs. H. D., Killeen, Texas.—You are evidently suffering with a gouty deposit in the joints. Wintergreen oil, rubbed in the joints at night, will help the local condition. Add to this a proper diet of green vegetables, free from sweets, pastry, meat, etc., and you will improve as to the joints and also as to the indigestion.

MRS. E. B., Elizabethtown, Ky.—Glaucoma is incurable, but an operation can be performed that will, at least, conserve a portion of the eyesight left in the good eye. This should be done at once, before the sight is entirely gone.

Fine Shaggy Teddy Bear

FOR A CLUB OF FOUR!

EVERY little boy and girl wants a Teddy Bear and bere is an opportunity for every father or mother who reads COMFORT to get one without expense. "Teddy" looks exactly as you see him in the picture above. He is a shaggy fellow, 10 inches tail, made of brown plush, paws lined with felt, carefully stitched and finished and his head, arms and legs are jointed in such a manner that you can place him in almost any position. He will stand up, sit up, stand on his head, go on all four feet, in fact, you can make him assume all kinds of positions that are so cosmical and illelike that it makes the children scream with delight just to look at him. "Teddy" is so well made that no matter how roughly he is handled he cannot become broken and with ordinary care should last for years. We will send you "Teddy" free if you will accept the following special Club Offer. For four one-year subscriptions to

Talks with ₩Girls

Conducted by Cousin Marion

IRLS, don't let this bewitching Junetime lure you away from the real work that is to be done for our soldier boys. There will be other Junes and other moons and other roses and everything else that goes to make June the most delightful month of the year and your conscience will let you enjoy it all much more if you do your share now and show others how to help. And now for the letters.

The first letter is from "Anxious to Know" of Utah, though that name is very inappropriate as she seems to know what to do and, better still does it. So many people know what they should do but lack the courage to do it. No, of course, I didn't mean you. A certain young man insisted upon kissing her and got his face slapped three different times. Persistent, wasn the? Then he bet with her and made the stakes a kiss against a kiss. He won. She pald the bet by sending him a candy kiss, accompanied by a bright little verse explaining that that was the only kind he could have and now she wants to know if it was fair. As our home lawyer says, "we are of the opinion" that it was perfectly fair, since he didn't specify the kind of a kiss. But don't make bets like that again. It is lots easier to stay out of trouble than it is to get out.

Marian, Washington.—You are a regular human in-kiss. But don't make bets like that again. It is lots easier to stay out of trouble than it is to get out.

Marian, Washington.—You are a regular human interrogation point, aren't you? Write just an ordinary, friendly letter to your seldier friend, telling him all the things you would be interested in if you were in his place, but don't write anything silly or sentimental. What would I do if the boys winked at me after I told them not to? I never had anything so delightful as that happen to me. I suppose I might throw a brick at them, but I think I'd just ignore their winks, and by and by they would get tired of such a silly performance and stop of their own accord. Ask your mother about the dances. She ought to say no. Comb your hair the way it is most becoming, only don't use rats, puffs and false hair. I know lots of girls that can't blush. You'll get over it in time, and in the meantime, don't think any more about it.

RUBYLIPS AND DIMPLES, Missouri.—That's a regular peaches and-cream name, isn't it, and descriptive of what every sixteen-year-old girl should be. Next time your girl chum tries to persuade you to keep company with the boys, tell her she has been elected a life member of the M. Y. O. B. Club, and maybe that will give her something besides boys to think about. Wait two or three years, anyway, and then be reasonable about it.

two or three years, anyway, and then be reasonable about it.

BLUE-EYED RUTH AND BROWN-EYED VIVIAN, Texas.—
If your sweethearts are the kind that want to "go" with other girls more than they do with you, I don't see how you are going to prevent it, since this is a free country, and I shouldn't think you'd want to. It is just your prides that is hurt, so let the other girls have them and get served the same way later.

Lydla, Cherry, Minn.—Write to the principal of the high school you wish to attend, and if your letter is as well written and as promising as the one you wrote to me, and he is at all human, he will be glad to render you every assistance in his power toward working your way through school. Don't give up the idea for a minute. Come again and tell me all about it.

THREE GIRLS, Little Rock, Ark.—No, I don't think it wrong for a man to address his fiancee as "dearest" and "darling" in his letters to her, but I do think it wrong for a sixteen-year-old girl to be engaged. (2) I fail to see why you should not be good friends with the man you were engaged to, even if the engagement is broken now, and even go automobiling with him. That's lots more sensible than not speaking. (3) Do I think it very bad for a girl to allow her fiance to hold her in his arms and kiss her good night? Well, no, I never thought it was so very bad, only don't keep on saying good night for an hour or so. Twice is enough.

keep on saying good night for an hour or so. Twice is enough.

DIMPLES, Olympia, Wash.—If you care as much for this man at the end of two years as you do now I think it would be safe enough to marry him, even if he is a foreigner; and perhaps your mother will have changed her mind by that time.

M. YUMA, Ariz.—Can't you "wish" him onto some other girl and thus rid yourself of his company? The poor fellow is probably lonesome, so try and make the best of it. A sense of humor is worth more than anything else I can think of and here's a beautiful chance for you to develop yours.

M. E. B., Jackson, Mo.—When a man says "I have a trade last for you," it means, or used to when I was a girl, that he has heard something nice about you and will tell you what it was if you will tell him something of equal importance.

HEARTEROKEN, Glendora, Calif.—Marry him if you are so afraid of losing him, but you are too young to get married. Personally, I shouldn't like the idea of a man telling me if I didr't marry him before he went to war that he wouldn't marry me when he returned. I wouldn't then anyway, but doubtless you have a better disposition than I have. My sympathy if you herefsetly lovely for the factors.

Two Twin Sisters, Houlka, Miss.—I think it is perfectly lovely for twin sisters to marry twin brothers but not when they are seventeen and eighteen years of age. Wait five years, as least.

B. A., Decatur, Texas.—Since forewarned is forearmed, there is no excuse for you falling a victim to this man's blandishments, as you fear you will. He has shown that he doesn't really care for you, so drop him just like this—bing!

Many, Great Barrington, Mass.—I know of no reason why a girl of twenty-one should not correspond with a man of twenty-eight, provided he wants to and writes first. And don't get silly and sentimental over it.

MAPLE FLOWER, Greenwood, Texas.—Why not turn over a new leaf and refuse to let any boy kiss you, even those you have heretofore allowed that privilege, or habit, as it seems to have been in your case. After a while you will have better luck in keeping a beau. You are too easy.

C. T., Omaha, Nebr.—Boys of fifteen haven't so very much sense and girls of sixteen aren't, usually, much better off in that respect, but you really should know better than to do as you are doing. I hope your respective fathers find out about these secret meetings and spank both of you.

BEOGEN-HEARTED CHUMES, Foremon, Ark. — Suit yourselves, but if you mean chums, why not spell it that way, or did you mean chumps? That's what you will be if you don't study more and spend less time thinking about boys.

uninking about boys.

M. B. of Newport.—Here's a girl of thirteen who writes that she is "desperately" in love with a man of forty-eight. I thought she meant her father, but she goes on to say that her father approves of her marriage to him but that her mother seriously objects. I am glad your mother has common sense even if your father hasn't. What would we do without mothers? As for you, well, you must be desperate, desperately foolish, to even think of such a thing. Wait until you are twenty years old and then if you want to marry him I won't say a word.

Don't you think I am improving with age, for all four feet, in fact, you can make him assume all kinds of positions that are be commissed and lifelike that it makes the children scream with delight just to look at him. "A card I never got, about something that was over long ago," bravely. "That card referred to last May. Some one had told Levallion it was last night. I told him the truth—and he believed me. Whatever that eard had to do with me once, it was not now."

"Then you were on good terms with Lord Levallion when he sent you for that liquent?"

"One better terms than ever in my life," hardly able to answer.

"Describe what you did when you left the drawing-room."

"I took the bottle off the shelf, and I thought it felt warm in my hands, like a ring some one has been wearing. And then my brother's doc, who was with me, barked and startled me. I nearly dropped the bottle. I wish I had."

"What did he bark at?"

"Lady Levallion swayed where she stood.

"I don't know." she muttered. "I—he flew it. I—thought'—Carrousel put a hand to his mouth as if to hide his pity for his mistress." "I thought it must be a cart in the hall. I caught it it. I—thought'—Carrousel put a hand to his mouth as if to hide his pity for his mistress." "I thought it must be a cart in the hall. I caught it acobs by the collar and he got away from me and tore back through my rooms and out into the hall."

Some one who had no business there, since had not been cailed as a witness, had come softly in behind her, but where he stood could see her face plainly in a mirror. The face he knew every line and curve of, just as he knew thing i both of them caught at his heart.

"Yes," listlessly. And then the faces of the jury seemed suddenly to leap into her eyes; live men, not automatons. She started, as if to back away from the dreadful thing that was written in those faces. But she stood dumb before them.

And every man of them thought it was the dumbness, the confession of guilt.
The coroner held out a rag of tweed toward her.

The coroner new see a suit of clothes of this her.

"Did you ever see a suit of clothes of this stuff?" he said. "Had Lord Levallion one?"

There was that desperate terror in her eyes now that Houghton knew. She looked from the jury to the coroner and back again.
"I don't think he had," she gasped. "I would not know."

Six Wheel Chairs in May

467 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The six May wheel chairs go to the following shut-ins, and the figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

Miss Edith Sass, 125 West North St., Rome, N. Y. 200; William Elma Williams, Quitman, Ark., 165; Wade Hipsley Riggs, Hartford, Ky., 144; Gladys Hines, Rockford, Ala., 132; George Leonard Williams, Post Hospital, Fortress Monroe, Va., 125; Ruby Pearl Clopp, R. R. 3, DeLeon, Texas, 123.

Miss Edith Sass, age 28, is badly crippled and much in need of her COMFORT wheel chair. This information, which is all I know about her comes from her devoted friend, Miss Mary Zieman, who sent the entire 200 subscriptions for this chair all in one bunch the first of May with 28 extra subscriptions for premiums which she ordered sent to Miss Sass. Surely Miss Zieman is an energetic worker and her achievement shows what can be done for the shut-ins by friends who have a will; for there is always a way for those who have the will to be helpful.

William Elma Williams, age 8, has no use of his legs and has been in this deplorable condition all his life. Mrs. Ella Bumpers, his nearest neighbor, who has "chaperoned" the movement to obtain a wheel chair for him, writes that he is a bright little fellow and, as he has good use of his hands, will be able to manage the chair himself.

Wade H. Riggs, age 9, a cripple from birth, can not stand nor even sit up, and has no use of any limb except his left hand. His mother, who has been active in getting subscriptions for him, will be much pleased to have the help of the chair in taking Gladys Hines, age 11, has never walked. She is crippled in both legs by infantile paralysis which attacked her in infancy. She is growing fast and her hands and arms are strong and she writes a nice letter describing herself.

George L. Williams, age 20, is paralyzed from his hips down. Eight months ago he fell from a rail-road car and broke his back, which is the cause of his crippled condition. He is, or recently was in the hospital under treatment for his injury.

Ruby Pearl Clopp, age 17, an invalid from baby-hood, has never been able to walk. Her mother was very desirous of obtaining the wheel chair for her and has been active in getting the subscriptions.

Many poor shut-ins are confined to the house or even to the bed for lack of a COMFORT wheel chair. Do your best, my good friends, to help provide them with the wheel chairs to get them out into the glorious summer air and sunshine.

Sincerely yours

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 25 casts each, sent in either singly or in clabs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours. Any shut-in who has friend at to help him get subscriptions can obtain a wheel chair free. Write me for information.

Such a Pleasure to Be up and Move Around in Her COMFORT Wheel Chair

WAELDER, TEXAS. APRIL 29, 1918.

EDITOR COMFORT:

DEAR FRIEND:
I have just received my Comfort wheel chair, and to say it's nice would be putting it mild. I am so pleased with it and it is so easy for me to wheel myself around and such a pleasure to be up in a chair. Every one that sees the chair thinks it is so nicely finished. I thank you and those that were so untiring in their efforts to get the chair for me. May God bless you all.

I also want to thank the one that wrote to me recently and sent me so many nice flower seeds and poetry and such a nice comforting little letter. She signed no name and gave no address so I cannot write to her personally. Thanking you again for the chair I remain,

Your sincere friend,

MES. CAROLINE ALFORD.

Thinks Her COMFORT Wheel Chair the Finest Thing Ever Was BLUE SPRINGS, MISS.

Mrs. Nathe Jones has received her chair in good order. She thinks it is the finest thing ever was. She had not been in her kitchen for over a year and now she can roll herself all over the place. She went in the kitchen and helped the woman that lives with her cook the breakfast. Now isn't it a great thing that she can go in her kitchen once more in her life? And Mr. Gannett, may God help you in your work of obtaining those Wheel Chairs for the Shut-ins.

Sincerely yours, Mrs. Lillie Price.

W. W. J., Rosebud, Ark.—Once more an inquiry for a "reliable instrument" to locate gold and hidden treasure. Although this subscriber wants to purchase such a so-called "diving rod or needle," we have to answer that there is no article of this sort for sale except by those who are "locating gold" by selling a worthless fraud to credulous buyers.

worthless fraud to credulous buyers.

H. H., Suring, Wis.—There is absolutely no market for mounted butterflies. They are of use only in the collections of museums—and these institutions do their own collecting and mounting.

L. S., Fife Lake, Mich.—There is plenty of vacant public land in the states you mention. For Arkansas, write to R. D. Newton, Camden, Ark. For Washington, write to J. L. Wiley, Spokane, Wash., and for Oregon, which has over thirteen million acres of public lands, write to N. Campbell, Portland, Ore.

Avo., Greenbrier, Tenn.—The way to sell a short story is to write a good one and submit a clean copy of it, typewritten on paper eight and one half by eleven inches, to some helpless editor. If you have inclosed the proper amount of stamps for its return, you will, in more or less time, get it back. Remember, it takes education, training, and a certain knowledge and experience of life, to build saleable literary products. And many men and women who have all these things yet have difficulty in disposing of their work. So you have no easy task ahead of you.

shall not fail in a single point that could be required of a child toward a parent. But you owe me a duty, also—I am your promised husband, Sibyl, we can never sacrifice a whole lifetime of happiness to a mere notion."

"It is not a notion, as you term it; it is a question of the most vital importance, and one which will affect our whole future. Do you think I could live to see the finger of scorn pointed at you—you, whom I glory in as above all other men? Do you think I could bear the looks of pity, the sneers and shrugs, which would everywhere follow you, if you should marry me? Your father would not wish it; auntie would not like it, and I could not bear to bring this trouble on those whom I love best in the world. No, Ray, it must not be."

"Sibyl, hear me," Raymond returned, folding very center. She had only to be passive in his hands, and the greatest joy she could ask in life would come to her without any effort of her own. "It is very noble in you, Ray," she said, with a wan little smile that smote his heart with keenest pain. "My soul glories in you for your fidelity; but I cannot accept it from you." "Sibyl, just so sure as the sun shall rise tomorrow morning, I shall send for Dr. Edgeworth to come and marry us," he answered, the veins standing out like cords on his forehead. "Then I shall have the added pain of telling standing out like cords on his forehead.

"Then I shall have the added pain of telling him 'no' also."

"You would not dare, Sibyl!"

"Ray, I would dare anything for your sake, I can even dare to crush out every atom of joy from my own life, and turn my back upon the blessedness which you held out to me. But, oh! my love, it is hard. I can never tell you how hard, nor make you know how dear you are to me. Do not think I am yielding you lightly, Ray. Your love is the most precious gift God ever bestowed upon me, and yet He has shown me that we must part."

She laid her cheek against his; she twined her me, and yet He has shown me that we must part."

She laid her cheek against his; she twined her fair arms about his neck, and dry, tearless sobs heaved her bosom.

"Never!" cried Raymond, through his set teeth. "We shall not part. I will never yield you while I live. Do you hear me, Sibyl? You are my betrothed wife. I will never release you from your vows to me."

"Not if I wish it, Ray?" she pleaded, with white face and quivering lips.

"You do not wish it," he said, crushing her passionately to him. "Every fiber of your being is reaching out to me with a mighty love that will never die. God does not demand such an unatural sacrifice. He would never have given us to each other only to have parted us thus; but wait—"

"He put his fingers into his vest pocket, and wait—"

He put his fingers into his vest pocket, and drew forth a tiny morocco case, and his face was as set and immovable as the mountains themselves, which were visible through the windows opposite which they sat.

While he was speaking he had slipped a ring upon her finger, and his eyes searched her face eagerly to see whether she would recognize this new bond.

"I thought to give you this before, but have not been able to find what I wanted until today; and now with this I bind you anew to the troth which you have plighted to me."

It was a circlet of diamonds, the stones all of a size, and set close upon one another in a delicate line of gold just sufficient to keep them together.

gether.

He meant to marry her in spite of herself or the world, and protect her from every ill or sorrow, which would otherwise come near her.

"Ray," she said, trying her powers of persuasion, "my mother is very poor, and it will not become me to wear such things as this now. Take it off, please," and she held her hand toward him.

Take it off, please, "and she held her hand toward him.

"No, Sibyl, as my wife it will become you to wear anything that I may choose to give you. To-morrow I shall bring you another to bear it company, and until a stronger seal is set upon you, this must be the thrall that binds you to me. Darling," he added, with infinite tenderness in his look and tone, "do you see the line of light it forms about your finger? It is not brighter than I will make your life as long as we both shall live—it is not brighter than will be the glory

WE GIVE THIS WATCH

For a Club of Six

Thirty Minutes is a short time, but many have earned one of these watches in less time than that. It is one of the very best watches for time ever offered to our readers, no matter what the price asked for it. We know, of course, there are watches that cost more money, because they are in gold or silver cases, but for practical everyday use they are no better timekeepers. This watch does not keep perfect time, we never saw the watch that did, but it keeps as near perfect time as watches usually do. We have such faith in this watch as a timekeeper that we send with every one a guarantee just as binding as that given with any watch, no matter what make. We are willing to give you this watch if you will do us a slight service, which you can easily do in an hour. We wish to increase our subscription list, and we want the assistance of every reader of this paper to that end. We do not want you to do it for nothing, we will reward you for it. You can easily secure this valuable watch if you will accept the following

See The Wonders Of War Through The Pan-Chro Scope!

If you have ever been to the "movies" and watched, the magnificent spectacle of a fleet of Uncle Sam's huge battleships under full speed—or a thrilling infantry charge "over the top"—or gazed upon the melancholy ruins of a Belgian village—then you have some idea of what you see when you look at the same scene through the Pan-Chro Scope, only of course the objects are stationary—not moving.

The Pan-Chro Scope is a new invention—something like the stereoscope, but larger and more powerful, being fitted with twin stereo-lens of wonderful magnifying power. The war views are taken with a specially constructed double lens camera. On the back of each view is printed a complete and accurate description of the scene represented. You place the view in the Scope, adjust the focus to fit your eyes, and immediately you find yourself face to face with an astonishing lifelike scene that resembles a section of a moving-picture film. One moment you are on the deck of an American warship:—the next moment you are "somewhere in France" looking into a trench where an anti-aircraft gun is working;—next you find yourself among the barbed wire entanglements in "No Man's Land;"—again you are watching fierce house-to-house fighting in a captured town, Belgian field artillery in action on the firing line, and many other scenes of actual warfare just as interesting and exciting.

The different views take you direct to Belgium, to France, or wherever the place may be, and show you the scenes fust as plainly as though you were there yourself.

48 Views Free With The Scope!

New views for the Pan-Chro Scope are constantly coming out and we have made arrangements to send you a set of forty-eight views free with the Scope. Think of it! Forty-eight gennine war views—all different. Among them you will find such scenes as:

In a British Camp in France.

Deep Trenches Bitterly Contested in Battle of Ypres.

French Military Camp Near Rheims.
Barbed Wire Entanglements Protecting German Allied Soldiers Firing From Trenches and Pericope in Use.

Anti-Aircraft Gun Being Worked in a Trench.
Fighting the Germans House to House.
Belgian City Leveled to the Ground by German Bombardment.

Bombardment.

Belgian Field Artillery on the Firing Line, and many other scenes just as interesting and exciting—forty-eight of them in all.

The Pan-Chro Scope should be in every COM-FORT home. It will prove a constant source of pleasure and instruction to every member of the family. Boys and girls attending school should have one. One look through the Scope will teach

The Real Cure

Six months ago the optimistic belief was prevalent both here and in Europe that American invention would solve the submarine problem in a highly spectacular and theatrical manner. American invention has not done so, but there is sufficient evidence to show that there is no need of waiting upon the inventors. The navy was already in possession of the weapon, and by concentrating building activities upon the construction of destroyers Germany's U-boats can be driven from the seas to rust at Kiel.—New York World.

Waste

Waste in a country which has not yet learned properly to conserve its resources is typified not merely in the wholesale condemnation of food. Travel along any railroad route you will see perfectly good wood being destroyed by fire simply to get rid of it. When a railroad tie of hickory or oak wood outlies its usefulness, the section foreman gathers in piles all worn-out ties and sets a match to them. Yet that same wood, throughly seasoned and splendid material for a kitchen range or furnace fire, if hauled to the nearest town would be salable to the inhabitants for firewood. Its potential heat, instead of being wasted, would serve to warm chilly people and to cook food. New York Commercial.

Japanese Women Ardent Red Cross Workers

"Few Americans realize bow much Japan has done during this war for the Red Cross," says the Foreign Press Bureau of the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense. "Her the Council of National Defense. "Her Red Cross membership far exceeded ours in the early days of the war; and she maintained hospitals in England, France and Russia for a whole year, just as we did. Like our own these hos-pitals had to be given up for a time for lack of funds. After this, however, Japan subscribed and sent a million dellars to subscribed and sent a million dollars to the wounded of the Allies, to be divided pro rata among them."

The Woman's Land Army In England

"Never forget that you are doing National Service, and therefore set yourself a high standard of work," is the British Government's advice to applicants for service in the Woman's the British Government's advice to ap-plicants for service in the Woman's Land Army. "Do not be discontented if you are found fault with or put to work that you do not like. Think of the men in the trenches and on the sea, and of what they have to do. They do not dis-obey their officers or shirk their duty. Make the most of your chance and be worthy of the trust that has been placed in you."

Comfort's Comicalities

Then She Haunted Him

His wife, who in build and appearance was of the scraggy order, had just died, and he, being of the careful and economical nature, suddenly remembered that he had a piece of marble in his back yard that would do for a tombstone. So he dispatched it to the local stonemason with instructions he should inscribe thereon the words: "Lord, she was Thine." But, unfortunately, the stone was rather narrow and the engraver, though doing his best, was unable to put the whole sentence in. So it came as somewhat of a shock to the bereaved husband when he saw the tombstone in completed form bearing the words: "Lord, she was thin!"—Chicago Herald.

Miserable Corns-How to end them

Touchy corns make thousands suffer—on pleasure trips—in business—at home—everywhere.

Until they once try Blue-jay.

Then they are corn-free forever.

Painful corns are utterly needless. Science has brought relief.
The medicated spot of wax on a Blue-jay Plaster stops pain instantly.

Then in 48 hours the corn painlessly comes out.

Harsh liquids are dangerous and messy. Paring may bring infection.

No corn can resist Blue-jay. Yet this way is most gentle.

The chemist of a concern known the world over for its surgical dressings discovered Blue-jay.

He studied corns for 25 years.

The Key to Happiness and Success in over a Million and a Quarter Homes

No More Important War Work than Child Conservation-Don't Neglect the Children

HE stern necessities of war have brought us, as a people, to a realizing sense of the wastefulness which has been our besetting sin, and under pressure we are making a struggle to overcome this habit of prodigality. We are urged as a patriotic duty to practice economy in every form and those recreant to this obligation are restrained by government regulation of the necessaries of life. Conservation has become the watchword of the hour.

But of all the wastefulness which we have tolerated the worst is the wastage of child life and health. Not until in recent years has the public recognition of this fact resulted in the establishment of the Children's Bureau by the Federal Government at Washington under whose auspices Baby Week was inaugurated for the first week in March, two years ago, as a nationwide crusade for the better care and conservation of very young children. The chief features of the movement were educational along the line of instructing the mothers how to take better care of their babies and thus reduce the shockingly large ratio of infant mortality equaling one infant death to every eight births and amounting to an annual total of three hundred thousand deaths of children under the age of one year for the entire country, fully half of them from preventable causes. Which means that the lives of one hundred fifty thousand babies have been sacrificed yearly to ignorance or neglect and might have been saved by proper care.

Such was death's harvest of infants in normal times of peace, but under the privations and abnormal conditions of war it is likely to increase and even extend its ravages to older children unless special efforts are made to counteract these deleterious influences. For this reason those interested in child welfare have undertaken a national movement to make this a child-saving year as a part of the great war work of the country. And this applies as well to the conservation of the lives and health of older children as of infants. The future welfare of the nation depends on the rising generation's health and vigor both of body and mind. Therefore let every mother remember that her first and highest duty of patriotism is to see that the physical, mental and moral needs of her children are properly cared for and she must not be beguiled into neglecting this service for any other form of war work. It is preeminently her war service and one that none other can perform so well. If after her duty to her family is done she has time and strength to spare she may well assist in the lighter kinds of Red Cross work, leaving the arduous war work to those who have no family responsibilities.

Working Mothers Imperil Child Life

THE employment of women, as a war expedient, in place of men to do laborious work is regarded with grave apprehension of consequences to health by those best qualified to judge of results, and they strongly remonstrate against the growing tendency in this direction. In regard to women volunteering for farm work Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, Clarence Ousley, in a recent address said:

"We have not yet reached the point where it is necessary for the women generally to undertake heavy work on the farms, but they can pender inportant service in helping to produce big food crops this year, especially in connection with the lighter farm tasks. I can imagine no finer thing, for a city woman to do in this war emertiance, the tarrest or for some other period of labor strain to help her country sister bear the burdens of kitchen and farm.

"There are thousands of men in the towns and cities doing things that women can do as well. There are men cooks, men waiters, men clerks, men bookkeepers, whose places might well be filled by women. I will despise American manhood if the great body of our men permit our women to be drafted for the hard tasks of agriculture until we have sent every able-bodied creature in breeches to the trenches or driven him to the fields, but women are to be encouraged, so far as their physical condition will permit or the circumstances surrounding them will advise, to engage in the lighter tasks of the farm, particularly in dairy work, in vegetable cultivation and in fruit harvesting.

"I have seen them," he said, referring to the farmers' wives, "hoeing in the hot sun while their babies lay in the shade of near-by trees. They are truly, and to the limit of their strength and their marvelous patience, the helpmeets of their husbands."

Certainly this last is not properly women's work, it is beyond their strength and at a sacrifice of their health and that of their children. The shortage of farm labor that necessitates it should be relieved by drafting the male idlers that loaf about the saloons and city streets to fight or work.

Infant mortality is closely related to women in industry, according to opinions of trained investigators who are preparing to safeguard human life during the period of war-time demands on labor, and this field labor is of the most arduous

Dr. Jessica B. Peixotto, head of the Department of Child Welfare of the Woman's Committee, Council of National Defense, believes that mothers should be kept in the homes so far as possible. She discourages day nurseries, because of the greater danger of contagion when many children are together and for the reason that nurseries tempt needy women to 'wean their children in order to enter wage-earning occupations. "You can not save babies if you can not give mothers advantages."

When the Care of Baby Should Begin

RS. Max West, of the U. S. Children's Bureau says: "Mothers are just beginning to realize that if a million babies are to be saved during the children's year, better care should begin before the baby is born. The first and largest number of deaths among little babies is due to what are called prenatal causes. The essential features of good care for expectant mothers are proper and sufficient food, rest, freedom from overtaxing forms of work and from worry, medical supervision of her general condition, and prompt attention to small ailments as they arise.

"An expectant mother needs a light, nutritious diet of digestible foods, such as she likes and her appetite demands. Fried and greasy foods, puddings, and all heavy or underdone pastries, or an excess of any article should be eliminated from her diet. It is also important that an expectant mother should drink a sufficient quantity of water each day. The mother should be under the care of a good doctor as long before the birth as possible in order that he may watch for and correct any untoward symptom that may arise."

The Children's Bureau, Washington, D.-C., will send to anyone asking for it a pamphlet giving simple directions to mothers-to-be. The bureau will, upon application, furnish information to associations or communities as to starting prenatal clinics or consultation centers for mothers where the services of a good doctor are readily available. We advise our readers interested in child welfare to send for these and other publications issued free by the Children's Bureau. Not only in infancy but through the period between that and school age children need especial care, and in this connection we call attention to the valuable article by Dr. Overton on "Bettering the Bodies of Children Under School Age" printed elsewhere in this issue.

Don't Shoot Pigeons—They May Belong to the Army

T the urgent request of the War Department we caution our readers to refrain from shooting and trapping pigeons, the reason for which appears in the following notice issued by Colonel L. D. Wildman, of the U. S. Signal Corps, which states that:

"Owing to the great need of homing or carrier pigeons in the conduct of the war, the Pigeon Department of the Signal Corps has been expanded to large proportions. Throughout the United States the training of these pigeons is in progress on an extensive scale.

"Considerable interference has been met with in this work on account of the shooting of pigeons being trained for service. Many persons have thus impaired the service of homing pigeons, being innocent of the fact that these were birds being trained for the Army.

"A law was recently passed by Congress making it unlawful to knowingly entrap, capture, shoot, kill, possess or in any way detain an Antwerp or homing pigeon, commonly called carrier pigeon, which is owned by the United States of bears a band owned and issued by the United States having thereon the letters U. S. A. or U. S. N. and a serial number. A maximum penalty of $100 fine, or imprisonment for six months, or both, is provided for conviction under this law.

"It is intensely unpatriotic to shoot or interfere with pigeons of any kind, inasmuch as the person indulging in this pastime has, no means of differentiating between the ordinary pigeon and the homing or carrier pigeons."

Strange as it may seem, considering the telegraph, telephone, the wireless and various other scientific inventions, there are conditions in war under which all human means of communication are unavailing and in such emergencies the army and navy have to rely on their trained pigeons to carry messages of the utmost importance over the heads of the enemy and above the smoke battle. A cage of carrier pigeons is a necessary equipment of a front-line trench or advanced observation post in France, and our battleships also carry these winged messengers. If one of these birds bearing the Government band comes into your possession through any chance you should give immediate notice by registered mail to the nearest military or naval authorities. The law so requires.

National Thrift Day

THE practice of the utmost thrift is so vitally sential to our success in war that June 28th has been appointed National Thrift Day and President Wilson has issued a special appeal to the American people urging them to put forth their best energies in useful production, to forego luxuries and reduce their expenditures to the purchase of such articles as are necessary for health and efficiency, and to save their money and invest it in Liberty Bonds, Thrift Stamps and War Savings Stamps. The Government needs and must have the money, but he also explains that the increased production and saving of food and other products and materials necessary for the army and navy which will result from universal thrift and economy will far exceed the financial benefit. Money will not buy what does not exist and if the people consume what the army needs the army will go short. The use of time, labor, money or material for an unnecessary purpose is unpatriotic wastefulness.

Lady Prescott, wife of Sir Athelstone Prescott, and her son Raymond, while traveling by coach, lose their way, and night overtaking them, they stop at a miserable inn, in a little fishing village on Flamborough Head. They are attracted to a little girl, Sibyl, who waits on them. Her winning ways, her admittance of the cruel blows given by Mistress Sloan, and that her own mother would not do it, convince them that the innkeeper is not her father, and they determine to take the child away. Seeking Mistress Sloan and that her own mother would not do it, convince them that the hinkeeper is not her father, and they determine to take the child away. Seeking Mistress Sloan for the consideration of thirty pounds, consents to let the child go, muttering she will keep her secrets. That night Sibyl is awakened and overhears Jem and his wife talking over the terms of the bargain, and through a chink in the wail she detects the place where an invaluable trinker, belonging to her, is concealed. with those people down at Flamborough Head, who have taken this way to get money out of us."

"But the necklace, how do you account for that?" again demanded Raymond.

"It is doubtless paste, or some other clever initation. You know they had that ornament which Sibyl wears for years, and they could easily have had a necklace made to match that," he argued stubbornly, yet very cleverly.

Raymond's heart leaped.

"What possible object could she have had, then," he asked, thoughtfully and doubtfully, "in telling such a story of shame? Surely she could not expect that would help her to gain either money or protection."

This argument seemed unanswerable, and Sir Athelstone was silent, although he bitterly rebelled against every stern fact.

Lady Prescott stole away after a while to comfort Sibyl, and found her burning with fever, and sadly in need of both sympathy and attention.

Raymond and his father discussed the matter until after midnight, without settling what was best to be done.

The next morning Sibyl was too ill to arise, but Raymond and his father paid an early visit to Mrs. Stillman.

She had expected them, and was accordingly prepared upon every point which they brought up. She told her story calmly, and in a very concise manner. It was exactly the same as she had related to Sibyl the day before, and no amount of cross-questioning could make her contradict herself, and both her visitors were compelled to acknowledge that her story had every appearance of being true. She showed them the necklace, and Sir Athelstone's theory regarding its being an imitation fell to the ground at once; for he saw that it was composed of gems of the most costly nature, and must have been purchased by a person of unlimited wealth.

On one subject alone she utterly refused to enlighten them.

She would not tell them who had been the father of her children, and no amount of reasoning or entresty could bring her to the point.

She would not tell them who had been the father of her children, and no amount of reasoning or entreaty could bring her to the point of confession.

ing or entreaty could bring her to the point of confession.

In vain Sir Athelstone promised that justice should be done her, even at that late day—the man should either be compelled to marry her, or provide handsomely for her in the future. She grew sullenly silent, and they had to relinquish all hope of ever learning that secret, and left the place with sad faces and heavy hearts.

"I shall marry Sibyl at once—she shall never leave us to suffer the scandal of such a revelation," Raymond said, on their way home.

"Wait, wait, my boy—if you marry her in such a hurry as this everybody will imagine that something is wrong; for many have been, and still are, very curious regarding the circumstances of her birth. I am not going to give up all hope that this is a cunning lie yet; I shall run down to Scarborough tonight, and see if I can find that family who took care of Mrs. Stillman during the sickness that followed her injuries."

Raymond gladly caught at this straw, and saw the wisdom of his father's advice.

Sir Athelstone was as good as his word.

He leff his patients and went himself to make the inquiries that he spoke of, and thorough business he made of it, too.

But everything he learned only went further to confirm the story he had already heard.

ness he made of it, too.

But everything he learned only went further to confirm the story he had already heard.
He could not find the family with whom Mrs. Stillman professed to have spent so many weeks; they had moved away many years previous, and no one knew where they were; but there were some living there yet who remembered a tall, dark, handsome woman, with black hair and eyes, who had been injured and remained there sick some time, and who had become nearly frantic, on being restored to health, at the loss of her child.

He then sought the form where the

He then sought the farm, where she said she had spent a number of weeks to regain her health before the accident.

He found it, but the man and his wife who had owned it at the time were both dead, and no one remained but a younger daughter, who had just married and settled there. The elder children had all gone away.

She remembered the beautiful lady with her little girl, and the nurse, but had forgotten their names entirely, and so Sir Athelstone went back to Dunfries with a very heavy heart, but convinced beyond a doubt that Sibyl's sad history was true.

He took her face between his hands, and pressed kiss after kiss upon her pale lips, trying all the while not to see the fixed purpose which still shone in her eyes.

Then placing her gently back upon the soft cushions, he left her, and went down to tell her sad tale.

pleaded in vain.

Her answer was ever the same:

"Ray, it cannot be."

To his reiterated assertion that he should obtain a special license, and send for Dr. Edgeworth, she only said, with a look of pain:

"That would only make it much harder for me, dear; I could not bear it, I am afraid."

"Do you mean, love, that you would refuse in Dr. Edgeworth's presence to be Raymond's wife?" asked Sir Athelstone, wondering at her resolution.

"Yes," she answered, but her face was deathly white.

"Yes," she answered, but her face was deathly white.

"It will not do, Raymond to press the matter now," he said; in an aside to his son. "It would take but very little to throw the child into a fatal brain fever. Wait a while until she is calmer, and then perhaps she will be more reasonable."

The next few days were full of pain and anxiety for the whole household.

Sibyl was so prostrated that she feared it would take her a long time to rally, but her will was very strong, and at the end of a week she began to mend and make preparations for removing to Aigeria street.

"Sibyl, can you love me and yet persist in this thing?" Raymond cried, in despair, on the last day she was to be with him.

"You know that I love you, Ray, better tham all else in the world."

"Will nothing make you yield? Be my wife, and I will take you and your mother anywhere—to the ends of the earth if you say, where you can have no fear of the world's scorn for me," he pleaded, as the carriage drove to the door to take her away.

He wound his arms about her as if determined she should not go; he bowed his head upon her bright hair, and shed such tears as a man can only shed once in a lifetime.

But the answer came sweet and low, though firm, while the slight frame shook like a reed:

"Nothing, my beloved! and God give you comfort. Oh, Ray," she added, nearly breaking down now that the moment of parting had come; "try not to think unkindly of me—try to believe that nothing but my great love for you, and the knowledge that it is right and best for you, could ever have given me strength for this hour."

"Sibyl, my darling, I know it; I know that you are sacrificing yourself and all your future hopes to a mistaken idea that it is for my good; but, love, you will see things differently by and by, and"—taking the hand that still had the diamond circlet on it, for he would not comsent to have it removed—"remember I do not release you from your promise to me; I shall never release you until you tell me you have ceased to love me; and this is the seal I have set to it. If I cannot have the right of a husband to care for you, I will remain true to you as your betrothed, and as long as we both do live we belong to each other. You will not forget my words?"

"I could not forget if I would. Oh, Ray! Ray!" and she went forth from her happy home with a mearly breaking heart.

Lady Prescott accompanied her; she had been there before several times during the last few days, and hired two more rooms adjoining those occupied by Mrs. Stillman, and had them furnished with all the beautiful things which had been in Sibyl's own room at Sir Athelstone's—her piano, her books, pictures, ornaments, and a hundred things that had grown very dear to her. Sir Athelstone, deeply agitated at her departure, had taken her in his arms and blessed her. calling life his "dear child still." and when

Thus Sibyl's trust that "some way would be provided," had been verified.

CHAPTER XXIV.

A. STRANGE VISITOR.

The spring following Sibyl's departure from the fisherman's inn at Flamborough Head, a strange woman was seen for several days prowling around in that vicinity.

She passed the inn again and again, peering curiously in at the wide door, stretching her neck to look in at the windows, and even slyly visited the stables, prying into every stall and corner with restless, eager eyes, and great anxiety of menner.

manner.

At last the woman entered the inn, and, without waiting to be shown the way, walked directly to the receiving room, and seated herself in one of the stiff-back chairs, with as much assurance and composure as if she were accustomed to coming there every day in the year.

After one quick, searching look around, she kept turning her head from side to side in a listening attitude, while her lips moved continually, and her eyes had a strained, yearning look in their clear depths.

Presently Nell Sloan made her appearance, looking much the same as at the opening of our story, only a little more obese in her proportions, and not at all improved in the tidiness of her attire or personal aspect.

"Well," she said, planting herself in the middle of the doorway, her hands on her broad hips, and looking her visitor over with her keen, bright eyes, "Jane said you wanted me."

"And so I do, Mistress Sloan. How do you do after all these years?" the stranger returned, coolly removing her bonnet, and turning her face upon the landlady.

Mrs. Sloan gave a sudden start.

"Well said! Ye hain't grown handsome since ye cut sticks from here," she began.

"I've come for the child; where is she?" was the next startling remark from the stranger.

"A pretty time this to come for the young one ye left squalling on my hands near about eleven year ago. Did ye expect to find her here, I sh'd like to know?"

A gray pallor overspread the woman's face, and her eyes filled with fear.

"Is she dead? did she die?" she gasped.

"Die! I guess not. She lived to be the spunkiest, laziest brat that ever drew breath; and a pretty penny she cost me, too, mooning around here from morning till night with a book in her hand, for ten long years."

"Yen? It's going on eleven now; isn't she here now?" and the strange creature caught her breath quickly.

"No, she ain't, and plaguey glad I was to get rid of her, too."

"Well, now, that's cool! Did ye expect ye could go off and leave a young one like that, and then come back after all these years, and put yer hand right on her again?" Nell demanded, with an ugly sneer, as she sank into a chair near the door.

"I could not help it; I did not know what I was about. That knock on my head took all my with an ugly sneer, as she sank into a chair near the door.

"I could not help it; I did not know what I was about. That knock on my head took all my sense away."

"Where have ye been all this time?" demanded Nell, with considerable curiosity.

"Sick; stretched on my bed with inflammatory rheumatism, in a foreign country, for nine years."

"Ye might have writ."

"I could not hold a pen in my hand. See!" and she held up her right hand all cramped and drawn out of shape.

"Well, ye might have got some one to write for ye, then."

"Nobody believed my story. They thought I was crazy. They did not speak the same language; and besides, I could not remember your name, nor where you lived," the stranger explained, in trembling tones.

"How did ye find the place, then, now?"

"I knew where that dreadful accident happened, and as soon as I could get on my feet I went to work to earn money to take me there. I had some idea of how this place looked, and for three weeks I have been tramping around to find it. Day before yesterday I stumbled upon the place, and I've been looking around to try to see if I could find the child, and not daring to ask lest they should tell me she was dead. I went to the schoolhouse and looked at every child, but there was no face among them all that looked like hers."

"Did ye expect to know her even now if ye had seen her?"

"Yes, yes; I could tell her among thousands. Ten years could not change her so that I should.

seen her?"

"Yes, yes; I could tell her among thousands. Ten years could not change her so that I should not know her. Oh! tell me, please tell me, where I can find her;" Nancy Crawford—for she it was—cried out, with eager pain.

"That's more than ye've any right to know, after deserting a little innocent like that," said Nell, cruelly.

"I know, I know; but I could not help it; tortures would not have compelled me to do it if I had been-in my/right mind," wailed Nancy, with streaming tears.

"Well, then, I can tell ye this much, a gentleman and lady came and took her away last November."

man and lady came and took her away last November.

"A gentleman and lady! What was their name?" gasped Nancy, eagerly.

"That's my secret. I've had trouble enough about the brat first and last, and I can't afford to give too much information free," Nell returned, with a greedy look at the little black bag which her visitor held in her lap.

"Oh!" she cried, "I'd gladly give you any amount of money, if I had it, but I've only enough to get me home from here, and then I'll have to earn more to start out again; for I must find my darling. I shall never know rest or peace again, until she is found and restored to her mother."

"Who is her mother?" demanded Nell, cum-

"You can't expect that I am going to tell you that, when you refuse me the simple thing I ask," returned Nancy, indignantly.

"Well, well, don't get mad and I'll tell you all I knew about it, which is precious little, since I have never heard a word, nor set eyes on any of them since they went away from here," Nell said, somewhat subdued. "You may believe I was glad of any chance to get rid of her, for she never

HE first and second letters on this page are splendid examples of patriotism and shining examples of what every one of us can accomplish if we but try.

The Red Cross workers can keep on with their good work, but there is need for immediate action if your appēal to your Congressman (get his name from your postmaster lif you don't know it) against raising postal rates on magazines, is to have any effect. You know better than anyone just what it will mean to you if such a law passes and if you have the educational interests of yourselves and children at heart you will not delay another minute in sending in your protest.—Ed.

Dear Mrs. Wilkinson and Sisters:

I've never seen a letter from this part of Arkansas, so will come in and tell you about our knitting club. There were forty-five women registered, which speaks well for our little town with only two hundred inhabitants. We found that yarn was very expensive, so we secured twenty pounds of wool, cards and wheel, and we are spinning our own yarn, which makes it much cheaper than buying it already spun. The children were very interested and amused as they had never seen any carding or spinning before. Several young men from this place have gone to the front to help protect our country. Among them was my youngest son. He joined May 7, 1917, and landed in France June 26, 1917. He is fighting now, and mothers and fathers that have sons there know what it means. Every Wednesday evening, when our knitting club meets and after our scripture lesson is read, we have a short prayer for God's divine guidance in all that we do for the upouilding of his kingdom here on earth. Failure to win this war means destruction to all God-fearing nations.

I will close by asking the prayers of all Christian people for victory in this war for without God's help we can do nothing.

Dear Corner seems quite a haven of peace in these troubled days, but I notice that some of the sisters are like myself—can't write a letter without mentioning the war. For me, everything else—woman suffrage, prohibition, labor problems—all, have taken back seats except where their speedy solution might help our nation in the war. It's not a time to clean house when the whole town's afire!

I've sent in a protest to our congressman against raising postal rates on magazines; have you? Got 338 signatures just among my friends and acquaint-ances. Rates will be raised in July if we don't let Congress know we won't stand for it. We need magazines now more than ever, for just news papers can't help us to understand the world crisis as we should. I have been on a committee to collect books for soldiers' camps, and was delighted to see quite a number of Uncle Charlie's books contributed, also Comfort subscriptions. My nephew in camp writes me that they are very popular with the boys—that he has seen many a chap reading the poems, with a big grin; has heard many allusions to "How U. C. Became a Hero in the Spanish-American War." If you want to send some sunshine to our boys, send them the stories and poems, and keep them in touch with home folks by a COMFORT subscription sent to the Camp Y. M. C. A. reading rooms. There should be a number of copies, for they are in demand and wear out by use.

Don't fail to dry a bushel of sweet apples this summer. When you use them, don't add a bit of sugar—only a little cinnamon. But go slow on pie crust—it's hard on both stomach and lard can. Also if you have more peas than you can use, dry them while still green, and they will keep their sweetness. Every bit of food conservation in our own homes is going to add to the food supply of our boys who are engaged in the greatest war ever waged for freedom.

Love to all.

Texas.

Here I come for the first time. I am tired of the discussion of city and country life. I'd like a seat by Y. M., for I, too, do not love my husband. He is kind to me and doesn't talk back when I fuss at him. O Sunday he does nearly all the work, makes the beds, sweeps and does most of the cooking so I can rest. In the afternoon we go driving and he spends the rest of the day with me. He is a good provider and doesn't drink or gamble, but, listen, he chews tobacco, but he loves me. We have no children. Hubby loves children and has always wanted to adopt a baby since I never would consent to give birth to one but they are lots too much trouble for me. I don't believe I would love one of my own. We are able so far as this world's goods are concerned to rear a family. I am twenty-six years old and have been married five years. When I try to look at my life I draw back, as it is empty.

I hope this letter will be printed. I may come again and tell you how I amuse warming the control of the discussion of city, Nebr.

Maybe you would like to know what I look like. I have light blue eyes, dark curly hair and weigh 140 pounds and was never sick in my life.

My letter is getting long, so I will go.

LULA.

Lula.—Your letter must have been designed and meant as a pride smasher for it has smashed mine into little bits and I can never feel the same again, never, never! When a person averages about four hundred letters a month for as many years as I have they may be pardoned if they think they know something about letters and peopie in general, but, Lula, you've got me guessing. Your letter is the very limit. I have a sneaking suspicion that you are trying to jolly me and still your letter seemed sincere enough. I won't say all that I think about you for I am in hopes you will awake to a realizing sense of your worthlessness and become a real woman. Write again and tell us it was all a joke and that we were very stupid not to have known it.—Ed.

when her thoughts were one thing and her words another.

"Think, Lady Levallion," said the coroner earnestly, "for even if you saw no one in Lord Levallion's dressing-room, some one might have been there! This rag of tweed was caught in the door, in the box of the door-latch,"
"I don't know it," was all she said. "I didn't see any one."

Something like a flash of lightning went through Adrian Gordon's brain. She knew it well enough, since it was a suit he had worn that May that was dead and gone—not that very suit he was wearing. She had seen some one, and was lying because she knew the clothes they wore. He strode into the middle of the room, tall, strong, blackly angry.
"Be good enough to put me on the stand," he cried roughly, for she should lie no more for so inconceivable a suspicion: to defend a man who had been miles away. "And look at my clothes, if you want to know where that rag came from!" Lady Levallion caught her breath, stared at him with narrowed eyes, and, without a word, slipped like water to the floor. But he never even seemed to see, never stirred as Houghton came quickly forward and took her to a sofa. Gordon took the tweed scrap and held it against his coat.

"You see!" he said contemptuously. "Now, perhaps you will think I poisoned my cousin!

Gordon took the tweed scrap and held it against his coat.

"You see!" he said contemptuously. "Now, perhaps you will think I poisoned my cousin! Fortunately, I was miles away that night, and with half-a-dozen other men, who can tell you so."

"Then I hardly see—" began the coroner.

"I will help you," and every soul in the room saw the sudden likeness to the dead Levallion as he spoke. "I was in London, but my clothes weren't. I had two suits exactly alike. I wore one of them down here the day I was taken, ill. They cut the coat off me, and when I was better I sent up to town for the other coat, and my man sent me the whole suit. I put it on and forgot about the other, with the cut coat. And I've never seen it from that day to this. But"—and he tapped the rag of tweed—"that came out of it. And that I can swear, for I spilt something on it, and you can see the edge of the stain on this. It was some one, dressed in my clothes, who caught their knickerbockers in Levallion's door, whether Lady Levallion saw that in spite of what he said the jury's eyes them or not." He laughed coldly, as he saw that in spite of what he said the jury's eyes were glued to the knickerbockers he had on. "Some one stole those clothes, perhaps you can tell me who!" he cried. "Till you find that out, it might be as well to accuse no one."

Houghton, bending over Lady Levallion in a distant corner, drew his breath. He understood something now of that terror that had been on her.

"I wish to God she'd told me, instead of lying!"
"They thought, as he saw her coming to. "They n't believe one word he says now; for he i't prove it."

won't believe one word he says how, for he can't prove it."

Nor could he. Not a servant in the house had known anything about his clothes. He had taken the second suit out of his box himself, and shoved the spoiled suit in there; from whence, on going back to town, he found it had vanished. The story was lame.

The coroner asked him a hundred questions that might have made any woman flinch to hear, since her name came in each one. But Ravenel, leaning, sick and faint on Tommy's shoulder, never winced. All that bygone story of the card Adrian Gordon told. His face was set like flint as he spoke.

as he spoke.

"I don't ask other men's wives to meet me after dark," he ended, contemptuously. "If the letters from that woman that prove it are lost," letters from that woman that prove there has been culpable negligence somewhere."

When told Sir Thomas Annesley had seen him at night with a strange woman in black, he When told Sir Thomas Annesley had seen him at night with a strange woman in black, he looked round the room quietly, as if to see which of the servants was like him in figure. But none was as tall, except Carrousel, who was stouter, and had a beard.

"Sir Thomas was mistaken," he said slowly.
"But I do not doubt he saw some one in my clothes. I was in my room. I know no woman with whom I would go out."

"To whose knowledge were you in your room?"

"Levallion's. He came and sat with me."

"Lord Levallion's!" said Aston slowly, and deadly disbelief in a man who could only call a dead witness crept into each juror's soul.

Gordon shrugged his shoulder.

"Have you all gone mad?" he said coldly. "If I can't prove I was in my room when Sir Thomas thought he saw me, I can prove I was in town last night. Just call my servant in, will you?"

And his man routed the jury, horse and foot. Captain Gordon had been in his own rooms, playing cards with some other gentlemen, with whom he had dined at the club. The man gave half-a-dozen names of men whose word would be taken on their oath, or not. Carrousel sat listening, with a curious scorn. It was all so different from his ideas of justice; so shortisighted, so biased. He even smiled a little at the foolish tale of those two suits of clothes, till Captain Gordon said quietly that his tailor's book could settle that question.

His sternness, his contempt for stupidity and foregone conclusions, had made the jury almost forget he had not been able to prove he was not the man who had drunk champagne in the wood. But, as he stepped down, the coroner recalled Lady Levallion; and she came, a living, breathing woman now, instead of one of stone. Relief was in her eyes, in her very hands, as they hung at her sides. But Houghton was looking like a man distraught at the coroner's face.

"You swear that you had no part nor lot in the poisoning of your husband: that you saw looking like a man distraught at the colored face.

"You swear that you had no part nor lot in the poisoning of your husband; that you saw no one in the dressing-room who could have put poison into that bottle of liqueur, or changed it?"

"Yes," she said quietly. "I swear I had no hand in it. That I tried, even at the last minute, to save him."

"Then," said Doctor Aston slowly, "how did you come by these? A housemaid found them this morning behind your window-curtains, in your bedroom."

He held out to her a bottle of Eau de Vie Magique, half-full, with a rough seam running down each side of the bottle; a tiny flask full of clear, faintly green liquid, that, as he uncorked it, smelled of bitter almonds in the hot room corked it, smelled of bitter almonds in the hot room.

Lacy started forward.

"That's my lord's bottle!" he cried. "I thought the other was not."

"Exactly," said the coroner. "And this is distilled laurel-water and deadly poison. I analyzed it, and gave some to a cat, which died in three minutes, with every symptom of prussic-poisoning. Gentlemen of the jury, we have heard all the evidence."

"You shall hear me!" Lady Levallion's face was on fire. "What do I know about those bottles?—nothing but that they were put in my room by some one. Find out who did that"—'for, with that deadly conviction gone from her mind, she could speak out, since that disappearing shadow in Levallion's dressing-room—a shadow that had been substance enough to bang the door in Mr. Jacob's' face, and run—had not been Adrian Gordon—"and you may find out who murdered Levallion. It was not I, for I would have died for him."

Every man of the jury turned to look at her, but not one of them spoke. To their stolid, conventional minds it seemed clear enough that she a,'d Gordon had had reason to wish Levallion was her in the business is to have made your sister a convenient scapegoat. And God knows that's black enough."

Tommy Annesley hid his face in his hands, and the tears oozed through his fingers.

"Don't led don't live said Houghton pitifully."

but not one of them spoke. To their stolid, conventional minds it seemed clear enough that she a.'d Gordon had had reason to wish Levallion out of the way, that the poisoning was her work, an unhappy, probably rejected, girl, who had been deceived into a marriage with a callous, heartless rake; that the story of the second suit of clothes was a trumped up fiction of her old lover's.

To the childish tale of the woman who had been seen looking in the windows they paid no attention. Plenty of people would have been glad to gape at the quality. One by one they filed out into the next room, some pitying even while they judged; others, a wife who could kill her husband like a dog, needed nothing but justice!

Justice!

Lord Chayter moved to Lady Levallion's side.

"My dear child," he said nervously, "no one believes you did it," but he knew he lied.

She could not answer. She looked at the women who had eaten her bread, and not one of them met her eyes; looked at Tommy, at Houghton, at every soul but Adrian Gordon, who stood apart in futile anger against every one, himself included.

"If it had not been for my alibi they would have thought I did it," he thought. "And now, because some one is too clever for them, they're putting it on her. On Nel! the horror of it made him quiver from head to foot. And I swore myself clear like a fool! No wonder she won't look at me. I'd have been hanged before I did it, if I'd known! I wish to God I'd got here at first," and he turned his back flatly on a man who was bold enough to come forward and greet him as Lord Levallion.

"Tommy thought was I? And what became of those letters Lady Levallion thought were in Levallion's pocket? They're a small thing, perhaps, but suppose I hadn't come down? Who was going to know that card of mine asking her to meet me wasn't written that very morning? Whoever took those letters meant it to seem so," emphatically.

"No one could have. Levallion—the body"—stammering—"was never left alone till the corone amen." "Tommy," said Houghton sharply, "take your sister away!" He moved to Doctor Aston and laid a hand on his sleeve.

"Permit me to congratulate you on your methods of conducting an inquest," he said, and in the conducting an inquest," he said, and his low voice was furious. "You are responsible for a damnably iniquitous thing if they commit her to trial. Where was your housemaid who gave that fool's evidence, and when did she give it? Not here, for I was your first witness."

"The second," said Aston uncomfortably, knowing perfectly well that to begin an inquiry with evidence like that was simply making all subsequent testimony worthless, in nine cases out of ten. "The girl was in the room when you entered it. There she is now!"

Houghton followed his eyes, and saw a pale, fat-faced girl turning to follow her fellow servants from the room.

"Find the man who that anemic, hysterical fool is in love with before you go far on her evidence!" he observed contemptuously. "Supposing it true, which I don't, you'd no right to begin the inquest with a biasing fact like that. An astute man like you should know that much."

"I had a right to conduct my inquest as I spleased!" hotly. "If you must know, the girl was too terrified to speak before the other servants. She came to me in floods of tears. I believe it cost her honest pain to come at all." "Honest!" returned Houghton, as cold as the other was hot. "Thanks to you and her—"

"He turned away without finishing. Because he was convinced, without any reason except a dogged belief in Levallion's wife, that she was innocent, gave him no, hope of upsetting the poposite conviction of a pigheaded man like Aston.

He stood in silent, dogged endurance till, after opposite conviction of a pigheaded man like Aston.

He stood in silent, dogged endurance till, after an interminable time of waiting, the jury filed in again. But the end of the chairman's speech made his heart turn over.

"Two attempts having been made to poison Lord Levallion, both of which were in the power of one person only, your jury are compelled to find a verdict of willful murder against Lady-Levallion."

Houghton was poor; the wives and children of each juryman were his patients; but he would not have cared if they had been kings and queens. "Permit me to congratulate you on a crassly incapable jury," he said to the coroner. "And you, gentlemen, on a piece of hasty iniquity that I pray you may never forget till your dying day."

But his face was gray with despair as he went out before they could answer him.

"Do you mean you know any one who was likely to have done it—who hated Levallion?" said Houghton bluntly.
"There were plenty," answered Gordon, as Lacy stinately. "Look here, Tommy, how could you think it was I Jacobs flew at that night in the wood? See him!" for Jacobs had lain down with his head on the speaker's boot.

"It was the Norfolk jacket and the knickerbockers and the height," wretchedly. "The other men were in the drawing room—none of the servants were so tall—except Carrousel—and he has a beard! This man had only a mustache. I saw the line of his chin when he stood up and yelled."

"As I should have been likely to yell and I saw the fine of his child when he reverseled."

"As I should have been likely to yell on account of Jacobs!" scornfully. "Why on earliedidn't you tell some one what you saw, Tommy?"

"I'd have only said it was you! I did try to tell Levallion, but the second I spoke about the woman he shut me up. Lacy was there; Levallion never talked before servants. Oh!" he broke off wildly, "what's the good of talking? Some one must go and tell Ravenel. Will they take her—to jail—till the assizes?" A hard sob broke his words.

"I don't know," Houghton muttered. "Perhaps bail"—but he knew quite well there was no bail her—to jail—till the assizes?" A hard sob broke his words.

"I don't know," Houghton muttered. "Perhaps bail"—but he knew quite well there was no bail for murder. He got up, for the boy was right. Some one must tell Lady Levallion.

"Damn that housemaid!" he broke out fiercely, standing with his hand on the door.

"Look here," said Gordon quickly, "wait a mement. Don't say anything like that outside; don't say a word to frighten any of the servants" "Why?" Houghton looked at him without too much favor. He had certainly had nothing to do with the crime, but his stay in the house had every day added one to the letters that spelled "murdetess" after Lady Levallion's name.

"Because they've all given their evidence; they're quite comfortable about none of them being implicated. They'll talk among themselves and compare notes, and they may find out something. I sha'n't allow one of them to leave."

Houghton realized suddenly that it was the new Lord Levallion who stood before him.

"I forgot," he said involuntarily, "you are master here now."

"And I'd rather be a one-armed sandwichman!" returned Adrian Gordon, with a bitter glance at the injured arm that had kept him in Levallion's house. And the memory of that day brought back something; the unknown woman who had come to see if he were dead. There was only one woman in the world who could hop, however falsely, to gain by his dying.

"Hester Murray!" he thought sharply. "But of all women on earth she would be the least likely to be here. Levallion wouldn't have had it." And yet the thought clung obstinately.

"I'll find out," he said aloud, and Tommy looked up from where he sat, wan and exhausted. "What?" he demanded. "I don't see how any one can find out anything. We know all anybody knows."

"We know all some one chooses us to know," hardly, "We're not beaten yet. Try and remember what that woman looked like whom Levallion told you was a kitchen maid."

"How do I know?" wretchedly. "I only saw her twice; both times it was dark. She had a cloak on with a hood, and "All the same she's our only chance."

He shivered, and stirred the fire. For if he were wrong and that cloaked woman not Hester Murray, the chance was small. Beat his brains as he would, he could think of no one else who might profit by the death of Lord Levallion.

The clock struck six, and, like a blow, the sound struck on his heart, making him forget everything but the girl upstairs. Houghton must be with her now; must be telling her what the jury had said. Houghton, an absolute stranger—while the man who should have been her husband dared not go near her; the man who should have sheltered her from all the world could do nothing but sit helpless while some one else spoke the very bitterest shame on earth in her ears.

"Nel, my Nel!" And if Adrian Gordon was silent, his spirits groaned within him.

Sylvia Annesley and her schemes had come between them once; then Levallion; and now, to the eyes of the world, a bar of blood they could not pass.

"Blood between us: love my love!" the man the eyes of the world, a dar of blood tale, not pass.

"Blood between us; love, my love!" the man said stiently, behind his shut teeth. "Not while I'm alive or there's a God above us. Somehow, somewhere, I mean to find the truth that's going to set you clear—and clean! If I dare not go to you I can work for you; and if I can't comfort you—unconsciously he raised his right hand as some men do when they take an oath—"I'll save you, if I have to take you out of Newgate!"

He raised his eyes and saw Houghton had come back.

He raised his eyes and saw Houghton had come back.

"Well?" he said thickly.

"Very ill." Houghton cast himself into a chair as if he could do no more. "She knew! That fool of a housemaid ran up screaming and told her, begging her to forgive her—if they hanged her! The French maid took the crazy fool by the ears and put her out. But—"

DO not think I can make better use of the space allotted to me this month—the month in which we celebrate the Glorious Fourth—than by quoting a few extracts from President Wilson's memorable and epochmaking speech, delivered in Baltimore, Maryland, on April the sixth last. That speech should have been read in every schoolhouse in the United States and its burning words should have rung in clarion tones in the ears of every living American. Our country, however, is so vast and the majority of people so wrapped up in their own affairs, that probably not one in a hundred of our readers are familiar with that inspiring oration. Read and digest these burning words, for on the way you respond to President Wilson's challenge to Germany depends the fate of your family, your home, your country and the whole future of mankind.

or on the way you respond to President Wilson's challenge to Germany depends the fate of your family, your home, your country and the whole future of mankind.

"Fellow citizens, this is the anniversary of our acceptance of Germany's challenge to fight for our rights and to live and be free, and for the saced rights of free men everywhere. We know what the war must cost, our utmost sacrifice, the lives of our fittest men, and, if need be, all that we possess. The reasons for this great war, the reason why it had to come, the need to fight it through and the issues that hang upon its outcome, are more clearly disclosed now than ever before.....Men in America may be more sure than they ever were before that the cause is their own, and that, if it should be lost, their own great nation's place and mission in the world would be lost with it..... I have sought to learn from those who spoke for Germany whether it would be lost with it..... I have sought to learn from those who spoke for Germany whether it would be lost with it..... I have sought to learn from those who spoke for Germany whether it would be lost with it..... I have sought to learn from those who spoke for Germany whether it would be lost with it..... I have sought to learn from those who spoke for Germany whether it was not justice but dominion and the execution of their own will. The avowal has not come from German's statemen. It has come from her military leaders, who are her real rulers..... We cannot mistake what they have done—in Russia, in Finland, in the Ukraine, in Roumania. They are enjoying in Russia a cheap triumph in which appears of the proper states of the cannot mistake what they have done—in Russia, in Finland, in the Ukraine, in Roumania. They are enjoying in Russia a cheap triumph in which appears of the proper states of the sta with unpitying thoroughness throughout every fair region they have touched. What, then, are we to do? For myself, I am ready, ready still, ready even now, to discuss a fair and just and honest peace at any time that it is sincerely purposed—a peace in which the strong and the weak shall fare alike. But the answer when I proposed such a peace, came from the German commanders in Russia and I cannot mistake the meaning of the suswer. I accept the challenge. I know that you accept it. All the world shall know that you accept it. It shall appear in the utter sacrifice and self-forgetfulness with which we shall give all that we love and all that we have to redeem the world and make it fit for free men like ourselves to live in. This now is the meaning of all that we do. Let everything that we say, my fellow countrymen, and hold dear. Germany defeat the force of those who flout and misprize what we honor and hold dear. Germany has once more said that force, and force alone, shall decide whether justice and peace shall reign in the affairs of men, whether right as America conceives it shall determine the destinies of mankind. There is, therefore, but one response possible from us. Force, force to the utmost, force without stint or limit, the righteous and triumphant force which shall make right the law of the world and shall cast every selfish dominion down in the dust."

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:
You will never know how we appreciate your talks in COMPORT. I cut them out and send them to socialists and pacifists, and I know it has changed some of their minds. My parents and my husband's parents are both German and that was the only language we talked at home, but my husband and I are true Americans. We believe in standing up for America where we have our homes and make our living, and we will stand by the red, white and blue to the last ounce of our strength. We have eight children and all red-blooded Americans. I had many a fuss with my parents because I would not teach them the German language but I am awfully glad I didn't. I have taught them to be loyal to our country and its flag, and I think it is high time the German press was put out of business in America. To read these German papers one would actually think one was in Germany and the Kaiser had all the say, or printed those papers himself. Uncle Charlie may you live to see the triumph of that democracy and the downfall of that autocracy in Europe which is a menace to every home in the land.

Yours sincerely,
MRS. JOHN F. REAVA.

In Europe which is a menace to every home in the land.

Mass. John F. Reava.

Three cheers for Mrs. Reava! Would to God every woman in the country, whether foreign or native born, had her patriotism and her spirit. If all had been like her, the Kaiser would never have made war on the United States. The pacifist thinks he can prevent war by quoting Bible texts that uphold his side of the argument and omitting all those texts which cut the ground from under him. The socialist movement has been in the hands of rabid German and Austrian nationalists and has been used here as it has been in Russia and Italy to promote pacifism and make the workers hate their native land and feel that their only salvation was to have the kind Kaiser and his Hun hordes come here and apply German methods and pay German wages. Wide-awake, patriotic American socialists quickly saw how the movement was being manipulated in the interests of Kaiserism and resigned from the party; and now, after Germany's treatment of Russia, the rank and file of the party who did not know how they had been duped and humbugged by foreign plotters and German Jingoes, thoroughly understand that if they want to realize their socialistic ideals, they must first lick Germany, the arch enemy of genuine, as distinct from, fake German socialism. As nearly all the Germans in this country intend to remain here and grow up with the country, and as they can only prosper as America prospers, it is to their interests to do as Mrs. Reava has done; cut out the German language and German mewspapers and bring up their children to be red-blooded Americans. Get all the people reading American literature and thinking in terms of genuine American literature and thinking in terms of genuine American here were in duty bound to be loyal and true, then the German language becomes as any other language would become under similar circumstances—a deadly menace. As Mrs. Reava says, one would think that many of these papers were printed by the Kaiser himself. The whole nation, however, is Thelma, your red hair five feet four inches tall must make you look like a human torch. Let me beseech you to cut out the crochet and tatting and do some knitting for the soldier boys. You are certainly making wonderful progress with your piano lessons. If you can play anything you want to with the right hand, and several plees with both hands, after two lessons, heaven only knows what you will be able to do by the time you have taken a dozen lessons. In my school days the only thing I could play was hookey. I used to play that however with my feet. We should all like to see you make the beds hoe the garden and sew some. The only eggs we ever see, Thelma, are old ones. Where all the fresh eggs of I have never been able to discover. It is perfectly correct to whip a fresh egg or anything else that gets too fresh, but to beat up a poor, ancient, ossified old egg, one that ought to be drawing a pension and too old to protect itself, is unkind to say the least. Don't waste your time beating eggs, Thelma. If you have any superfluous energy go out and beat the Kaiser. If you can't beat him, feed him on one of those ancient eggs and that ought to fix him.

Ashamed of Corns

As People Should Be-They Are So Unnecessary

The instinct is to hide a corn. And to cover the pain with a smile. For people nowadays know that a corn is passe. And that naught but neglect can account for it.

It is like a torn gown which you fail to repair.

Or a spot which you fail to remove. The fault lies in neglecting a few-minute duty—just as lies in negle with a corn.

Any corn pain can be stopped in a moment, and stopped for good. Any corn can be ended quickly and completely.

All that is necessary is to apply a little Blue-jay plaster. It is done in a jiffy. It means no inconvenience.

Then a bit of scientific wax begins its gentle action. In two days, usually, the whole corn disappears. Some old, tough corns require a second application, but not often.

letter to the Comfort. We live on a farm, and I like farm life very much. We went to Selma to have my foot operated on so I could walk. I go to school in Sweet Water. I would love to hear from some of the cousins and will try to answer all the letters and postal cards I receive. Your little niece, BARBARA NAYTON.

Barbara, I hope that operation on your foot will be entirely successful. Life is hard enough for those who are healthy and strong, but it is little short of a tragedy for those who have to go through it sick or crippled. You say you are in the forth grade. Make it fourth the next time. So you go to school in Sweet Water do you? Well if I had to go to school in water, I think I would prefer to have it sweet. Don't you find it rather damp? Sweet water it seems to me would be an excellent school for ducks but a very poor one for humans. Billy the Goat says he thinks Barbara means that she goes to school at Sweet Water. Let us all fervently hope so.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am fourteen years old and I go to school eight months out of the year. We have only four months for a vacation. I suppose that is long enough. I am in the seventh grade. We study several branches. I like arithmetic best. I have one brother and one sister. We all work in our war gardens. We raise almost all kinds of vegetables. We love vegetables and hope you love them. I wish you were down this fall and winter to help us eat them. We will have pumpkin pie when you come. I go to Sunday school every Sunday. I enjoy reading the papers, they have puzzles in them. We make out the puzzles. The next Sunday when we get the paper we see if our answers to the puzzles are correct. We have a great time in the summer time to keep cool.

Yours truly,
MILDRED LOVE.

So you have four months' vacation every school year do you Mildred? If I had four minutes I'd think I was lucky. Delighted to know you are working in your garden. Do I love vegetables? I fairly dote upon them, but have never had much success in my love affairs with vegetables. Just what my experience has been I think I had better tell you in rhyme:,

I loved a little carrot once, so rosy and so red.

And I foundly hoped that some day that carrot sweet might wed.

For that bean calls me a has been, and it hits me on the bean.

Kristine, I'm so sorry you had such bad luck with your garden. I know how you feel for I bad exactly the same experience. You see I didn't know much about gardening and I planted all the seeds upside down. The result was they grew down instead of up and a man in China got the whole crop— and I got nothing. Possibly you gave your garden too much attention. Maybe you gave your garden too much attention. Maybe you swept, dusted, cleaned and bathed it so often that the seeds didn't have a chance to grow. Now for heaven's sake child, don't worry about your height or rather your shortness. Men like their opposites. You will always find a little sawed-off runt of a man married to a woman twice his height, and you will always find a cloud scraping giant of a man whenever he gets the chance, camping on the trail of a girl so small she couldn't steal a pie from a table, without the assistance of a stepladder. If you try and grow another millionth of an inch you are foolish. In a few years' time, at least a dozen six-foot giants will be asking you to be their little baby girl. Don't bother about physical growth but do try and grow mentally. If your heart, mind and soul become a garden of beauty, you will tower above as Pike's Peak towers above a molehill. There is another advantage however, in being petite—you don't have to suffer from growing pains. A small man is generally a fussy nuisance, but a sunllower. Just be content to stay a violet, Kristine.

I loved a little carrot once, so rosy and, so red. And I fondly hoped that I some day that carrot sweet might wed.

But when I asked it to be mine my hopes began to flee.

For that pretty little carrot didn't carrot at all for me.

Then I made love to a sugar beet, oh, it was awful sweet, That beet it made my heart beat so I simply couldn't eat.

But when I popped the question, as of course I did one day.

That beet told me to beat it, so I beat it right away.

That beet told me to beat it, so I beat it right away.

Then I loved a little lettuce, I-happy was, oh, gee!

For that lettuce didn't hesitate, but gave its heart to me.

And when I talked of wedding bells, you know the usual stunts.

That lettuce quit its bed and said "Oh, let us wed at once."

But that faithless little lettuce with a cabbage ran away.

So I made love to a butter bean and we married were next day.

But this vegetable love of mine is far, far from serene,

For that bean calls me a has been, and it hits me

For that bean calls me a has been, and it hits me on the bean.

That cruel bean I soon divorced and a water melon wed,
I loved its green exterior and its wondrous heart of red.

But with a coon it ran away, you'll say, oh, what a crime,
"Water-meloncholy story, water-meloncholy rhyme."

Thank you friend Joseph, for your kind and encouraging letter. Thank God you are able to visualize this great world crisis in its proper light and realize the menace of it all. The world is on fire. I have seen the flames spreading for years, and I was deluged with abuse by the blind and the thoughtless, because I knew that ere long those flames would leap across the ocean and engulf us, so I pleaded for preparedness, pleaded earned her salt, and so I let her go."

"If she never earned her salt why didn't you send her to the poorhouse?" demanded Nancy, shrewdly.

"Well, you see there is a little bit of feeling inside me, if I am rough on the outside, and so I never could bring my mind to do that."

"Who was the lady and gentleman?"

"Well, I can't just remember their mame now," Nell repled, with a well-assumed air of perplexity.

"Now you are lying, Mistress Sloan," Nancy

"Now you are lying, Mistress Sloan," Nancy said, sharply.
"Well, I ain't a proper hand to remember names, but she writ it on a card for me, and it's tucked away somewhere among my things—perhaps I can find it before you go," Nell answered, with a look at her visitor which said she thought she might not be any too sane even now, and it would be best not to anger her.
"Where do they live?" was the next eager question.

with a look at her visitor which said she thought she might not be any too sane even now, and it would be best not to anger her.

"Where do they live?" was the next eager question.

"That was on the card, too. My memory don't always serve me, I tell ye," Mrs. Sloan returned, dryly, then added, "But what's your name? The young one always cailed you Nannie, but I could never get her to tell me anything more."

"Oh! the darling—the precious! how could I ever have been so wild as to have gone away and left her here?" Nancy cried, wringing her hands, and glancing first at the repulsive woman opposite her, then about the cheerless apartment. But a moment later she added, more calmly: "My name is Nancy Crawford, and I had been the child's nurse ever since she was born."

"Well, Nancy Crawford—if that is your name—if that child belonged to any of the quality, which I suspect it did, I must say ye did a fine day's work when ye walked off that fine morning and left her in this village."

"Oh, I know it—don't I know it as well as you can tell me? And now I must find her again!" she cried, wildly.

"If ye can, ye mean," put in Nell, viciously.

"If shall find her if she is living—I know I shall. I will search the world over, and spend my last breath in my quest, before I give it up. Ah! if you will only give me that card, it will not be long before I shall be successful amd restore her to her mother."

"How do ye know that she is living?"

"I have taken care to find out about that since I came back to England; but I can never let her know that I live until I can carry her news of her long-lost child. Will you give me that card?"

"How do ye know that she is living?"

"I have taken care to find out about that since I came back to England; but I can never let her know that I live until I can carry her news of her long-lost child. Will you give me that card?"

"How do ye know that she is living?"

"I have taken care to find out about that since I came back to England; but I can never let her whow it is an any part of the part when my head ached so. Now, what have you done with it?"

"What have I done with it, indeed!" Nell retorted, tossing her head defiantly. "Ye must have taken it away with ye yerself, if there was any such thing, for there ain't anything like it in this house now. Where did ye go when ye went away from here?" she asked, anxlous to change the subject, as well as feeling some curiosity about the matter.

"As near as I can find out, I wandered to Hull, where, confused, exhausted, and ill, I crawled on board a trading vessel, which plied between there and Holland.

board a trading vessel, which plied between there and Holland.

"I was not discovered until the vessel was well out to sea, and, being very sick then, I could tell them nothing, so they were obliged to take me along with them. The captain's wife was on board, and I am told that she gave me every care; but I had a severe attack of brain fever, which left my mind very weak for many months afterward, and therefore I did not recover sufficiently to tell my story before they were obliged to go on another voyage; so they left me at a hospital in Amsterdam, from where I was afterward carried to the almshouse.

"Before I had fully recovered from the brain fever, inflammatory rheumatism set in in its worst form, and for many years I lay upon my bed, a miserable and helpless cripple. In a strange country, and among strange people, of course I could not understand their language, nor they mine; and, when I at last managed to learn enough to make myself understood, everybody laughed at my story, and said I was cracked.

"It is a wonder that I ever got well; but I did, or at least able to hobble about and help myself; I don't suppose the cramps will ever straight again, but I can manage to do a good deal of work as it is.

"Well, I left that miserable place, and glad enough I was, too, to get away. I went to work, to get money enough to pay my passage to England, with the one hope of finding my little Sibyl, if she were yet alive, and restore her to her parents, if they had not been go fortunate as to have already found her.

That's all I have to tell you, Mistress Sloan, and you will perceive that I'm not over rich, and you will perceive that I'm not over rich, and you will perceive that I'm not over rich, and you will perceive that I'm not over rich, and have no money to pay you for any information regarding the child. But if you will put me on her track, and I find her, I can promise you something handsome as soon as she is restored to her parents."

"I suppose ye are going to tell me who her folks be?" Nell said, again and Holland.
"I was not discovered until the vessel was well to her parents."

"I suppose ye are going to tell me who her folks be?" Nell said, again recurring to the one subject of the most importance to her.

"I shall tell you nothing until I see that card which you say you have in your possession," Nancy replied, firmly.

Nell saw that she could gain nothing more from her without some concession on her part, and after pondering a few minutes, she arose, saving:

"Well I will see if I can find the card."

"You've been and stole it!" she cried, shaking her fist in the astonished woman's face.

"Stole what—the card? If I could have done that, Mistress Sloam, believe me, I should never have troubled you tonight," Nancy said, after a minute, as she composedly resumed her eating.

"The card—goodness, no! but the di'mond with them white things all around it. Give it up, I say, or it will be the worse for ye!" and the angry termagant approached nearer.

Nancy's eyes gleamed with sudden fire.

"The 'diamond with the white things around it' is the jewel to which I referred a while ago. I thought you had never seen it, Mistress Sloan," she remarked, shrewdly, as she turned and faced her enemy.

Nell stopped, aghast.
"Did no one know you had it but yourself, Mistress Sloan?" Nancy demanded, looking her

Her face flushed almost a purple, and then paled with passion; and, without another word to her guest, she turned and darted from the

to her guest, she turned and darted from the room.

A few minutes later Miss Crawford heard flerce, angry words in the back kitchen between the husband and wife.

But Jem again and again protested his entire innocence in the matter, and appeared so greatly disturbed upon learning of the jewel's disappearance that Nell was obliged to be convinced that he spoke the truth, and forthwith returned to her attack upon Miss Crawford.

But Nancy was nowhere to be found.

A piece of silver lay beside her plate, upon a half sheet of paper on which was written:

"For my supper. But, Mrs. Sloan, I know nothing about the jewel, and as I cannot be detained in my work by useless questions and abuse, I bid you a quiet good by.
"NANCY CRAWFORD."

Nancy had feared that if Nell in her passion should have her arrested for the theft, it would be very hard to prove her innocence, and great trouble and delay might result from it.

So she very quietly took her departure during the husband's and wife's dispute.

CHAPTER XXV.

"WHY WILL YOU TORTURE ME?"

"You are killing yourself with this thankless immolation. You are literally burying yourself alive for this old woman—I beg your pardon, dear, but I can't help it—who cares nothing for you, except what she can get out of you."

This indignant speech came from Raymond, who insisted upon coming every day to see Sibyl, and who never dreamed that these very visits, which were at once so sweet, yet bitter, were helping to rob her of her bloom, and sap the vitality of her life.

"Hush!" she gently answered to this passionate outburst, and softly touching his lips with her fingers, "you are speaking ill of one who, as my mother should command your respect; and, Ray, you would neither love nor esteem me if I should do any different from what I am doing. While my mother lives, I have no right to leave her."

"I do not ask you to leave nor to neglect her While my mother lives, I have no right to leave her."

"I do not ask you to leave nor to neglect her in any way: I only ask that you will give me the right to share this burden, which is too heavy for you to bear alone. Let me take you and shelter you in my strong love, for I know you would be happy with me if you would only yield; and now, my darling, you are fading away before my eyes."

"Ray, do not tempt me; my path is marked out plainly before me," Sibyl began.

"See!" he continued, his strong lips quivering as he held up her left hand, "how thin you are growing. My ring is already too large for you, and it will not be long before it will drop off, and be lost. Oh, Sibyl! Sibyl! why will you torture me thus?"

How could he torture her so, when her poor and be lost. Oh, Sibyl! Sibyl! why will you torture me thus?"

How could he torture her so, when her poor heart was breaking and longing for him every moment in the day?

"I will not be cheated thus," he continued, with sudden resolution, as, taking a plain gold ring from his little finger, he placed it above the circlet of diamonds. "There," he said, "that ring must never leave your finger. I will not give you up; you are mine yet, Sibyl; you are mine until you die. Do you know it?"

"Oh, Ray! you know I could never belong to any one else, even though I cannot belong to you; and—oh! I do not mean to murmur, but the future does look a little dark just now, and I am a little weary with my pain."

"Then, darling, come to me and rest; let me shield you, comfort you, bless you;" and he gathered her close in his arms.

"No, no; you must not tempt me. Don't you see that I cannot bear it." she cried, gently repelling him and nearly breaking down."

"Sibyl! do you love me?"

Her voice was sadder than tears, and her reproachful eves cut him to the heart.

"Oh, Ray!"

Her voice was sadder than tears, and her reproachful eyes cut him to the heart.

"Forgive me," he said, kissing her trembling lips; "I know that you love me, darling—but do your love your mother, Sibyl?"

She cried out, and put up her thin hands to hide her face.

That was the sharpest prong in her crown of thorns.

thorns.

She knew that she did not love her mother, and could not love her as she ought.

She knew also that her mother had no real affection for her, and had not the least desire to win her own.

"She will die, and then I shall go mad," Raymond had said to his mother, after one of those fruitless and exhausting interviews, and he had left Sibyl looking more like a spirit than a human being; and Lady, Prescott could only comfort him by bidding him waft, hope and be patient.

She sent Sir Athelstone, however, to prescribe for Sibyl, and he saw at once that her strength was failing beneath her trials.

"You must go away to the sea, dear," he said,

He really believed that the sea air would do

He really believed that the sea air would do her good, and it would at the same time achieve a twofold object—remove her from Raymond's influence and entreaties, as well as bring back the roses to her cheeks and strength to her body. Something of this Sibyl must have thought of herself, for she made no objections to the projected change, and it was at last decided, that as soon as the weather permitted, they would go away somewhere to the seashore.

Sir Athelstone kindly arranged it all, and chose the quiet little town of Barmouth in Wales, "where," he said, "with the mountains behind her, and the sea before her, he hoped she would soon grow to be their own dear Sibyl again." Mrs. Stillman, however, did not want to go away to that dull place on the coast of Wales, she privately imparted to Miss Therwin during one of her friendly (?) visits.

Miss Therwin had, by the way, proved herself one of the girl's sweetest comforters during her trials, coming often to sit with her, bringing her music, flowers, books and fruits, and making herself so kindly and unobtrusively sympathetic, that Sibyl could not say enough in her praise. "You must go," she vehemently asserted, during an interview with her one day when Sibyl was out.

The Duc d'Aubigne had been bitterly disappointed at thus losing sight of Sibyl.

One day, on returning from the public library, where she had been to exchange a book, Sibyl was dimly conscious that some one was walking behind her.

BETTERING THE BODIES OF CHILDREN

By W. Clyde Overton, M. D.

Dr. Overton is an eminent specialist in the treatment of diseases of children; is in charge of the Children's Clinic of Flower Hospital, New York City, and Lecturer on Children's Health. We hope the mothers will carefully observe his instructions and will preserve this article for future reference and guidance.-EDITOR.

Copyright, 1918, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

HE most neglected, important period in the physical life of the child is the toddling, before-school age. Most mothers are familiar with the tests, feeding and safeguarding of the infant. The baby is, more or less, in the skilled hands of the physician, but suddenly there comes a transition in the life of the human plant, our child.

He is removed from liquid food and control the home table child.

He is removed from liquid food and seated at the home table.

"Bobby is eating everything now," the mother exclaims as if that fact relieved her from all responsibility in connection with his diet.

"He can play out of doors," she further attests. That Bobby eats indiscriminately and enters into the life of the community and home through being at last "on his feet," prove the high child death rate between the years of two and seven; prove the prevalence of rickets, infantile paralysis and contagious diseases. The child from the age of two up to school age is exposed to dangers from a mixed diet and to disease menace from contact with germs that are as vital as the diet and disease dangers of infancy. If we are going to carry our children up to healthy man and womanhood, we will surround the period before the mental strain of the first school year with all the care and forethought that science and medicine can bring to bear upon the growing child body.

I am not going to set an arbitrary standard medicine can bring to bear upon the growing child body.

I am not going to set an arbitrary standard for measuring the status of the perfect child. To do this is to discourage the mother whose children may be handicapped by a previous disease record or other conditions which necessarily make growth slower and builth less sure than in the case of the child who is well from birth. I will, instead, outline a program of home care in feeding and prevention of disease which, if followed to the letter for six months, ought to leave your child, between the ages of two and seven, better than when he started.

Diet .

The food of the child from two to seven years must consist of well-balanced starches, proteids and fats. To state a reason for this, simply, I may say that the starches and fats provide the necessary heat and energy for the little body and the proteids do the necessary repairing and building of body tissue necessitated by the child's new activities of walking, running and playing. To feed the child any one of the foods containing these values, to the overbalancing of the other is to block the progress of the human engine. To feed the child stimulating foods which interfere with the action of these is to, possibly wreck the little human dynamo.

Foods that contain the maximum of starch,

Foods that contain the maximum of starch, proteids and fats and the only foods which should be taken into the child's stomach during the first dentition are:

Cooked Cereal.

Soft boiled, Eggs: Coddled, Poached.

Meats:

Mutton.

White meat of chicken, Soft, white meat fish.

Breads:

White and entire wheat, two days old, Zwieback, Rusk, Graham crackers, Educator crackers

Vegetables: Potatoes, baked, sparagus tips, Celery, cooked, Carrots, boiled or stewed,

Peas, fresh, Beans, string, Spinach,

Not greasy, Not containing vegetables unless strained. Broths:

Fruits: Oranges, Apples, baked, Prunes, stewed

Peaches, Pears. Grapes.

Desserts:

Junket, Custards Rice pudding with raisins, Ice cream, Milk Chocolate, Fresh fruit jam or jelly.

General suggestions in connection with this dietary would be that cereals be cooked a very long time and served with as much salt as the child will take; peas and beans will be more easily digested if put through a coarse colander and served in a puree or pulpy mass; little sugar should be allowed on cereals; there is danger in swallowing fruit seeds, therefore all should be removed from fruit before it is given to the child; and a certain amount of fruit should be given children every day.

No game, sweetbreads, pork, sausage, liver, raw cele ry, fried or scrambled eggs, greasy soups or fresh bread should enter into the diet. The food value of the best sweet chocolate in cakes can haredly be over estimated. I have brought children through typhoid fever on it.

Two differentiated, model meal plans may be suggested. They differ in the frequency of the meals and their character. The five-year-old child, who is more factive than his little toddling brother, needs more food at each meal, but is able to wait longer periods between them. The foods listed constitute a perfectly whose food values in relation to the growth and health of the child is perfect.

DAILY MEAL'SCHEDULE FOR THE CHILD OF TWO TO THREE YEARS.

OF TWO TO THREE YEARS.

6.30 A. M. Four to six ounces of milk (about a tumbler full). Two to three table spoonfuls of cooked cereal served with milk and salt.

8.30 A. M. One to two ounces of fruit cake, or a dish of stewed prunes.

11.00 A. M. Four to six ounces of milk, Zwieback, toast or crackers.

1.30 or 2.00 P. M. Egg or beef juice or meat. One vegetable. Bread. Dessert.

Upon waking from nap. Four to six ounces of milk.

6.30 P. M. Milk. Apple sauce or baked apple. Bread with a possible accompaniment of jelly or jam.

Milk chocolate after meals,

DAILY MEAL SCHEDULE FOR THE CHILD FROM THREE TO SEVEN YEARS.

7.00 A. M. Milk. Cereal, served with cream and salt. Fruit.
11.00 A. M. A mug of milk. Bread or toast or crackers, with jam or jelly.
1.00 or 2.00 P. M. Soup or broth. Meat. Two vegetables. Bread, with little butter or jam. Dessert or fresh fruit.
6.00 P. M. Light soup. Vegetables. Bread, as at noon meal. Dessert or fresh fruit.

Milk chocolate after meals.

Following this dietary, which is planned according to the scientific analysis of each food in relation to the needs of the child body, should result in immediate normal growth, providing that the general health of the child is safeguarded. This growth may be compared with the following table of model weight, height and chest measurements, although your child need not "measure up" to it. Your test will be any gain from day to day along these lines, carefully watched and day along these lines, carefully watched and

Following a few simple directions will safe-guard the child from disease at this important stage in his development. It is a mistaken idea that childrensmust go through a series of con-tagious diseases between the ages of two and seven. The reserve force for combatting these, should they come to the child, will be greater after the second dentition than before. The mother may and should surround the home child with every possible hygienic protection at home.

Bathing Rules

The child should have two baths every day, one in the morning and one before going to bed. The best soap to use is castile or a pure, white soap, and the health value of the bath is increased materially if salt is used, in the proportion of a handful of salt to each gallon of water. A necessary bath accompaniment is a good bath thermometer, which may be purchased at a drug store for a dollar at the least. For the child of two, three and four years the temperature of the bath should be from 85 degrees Fahrenheit to 90 degrees. As the child grows older, up to the age of seven years, the bath temperature should be lowered; from 60 degrees Fahrenheit to 80 degrees is proper. The morning temperature should be lowered; from 60 degrees Fahrenheit to 80 degrees is proper. The morning bath should be followed by a cold sponge and both morning and evening the child's body should be carefully powdered with a pure powder, warding off such skin diseases as eczema.

This bathing schedule may be taught children so as not to take too much of the mother's time. Even a very young child may learn to bathehimself.

Sleeping

A schedule for sleeping comes next in health value. The two-year-old child needs from fourteen to fifteen hours of sleep, mostly at night. The seven-year-old child needs ten hours of sleep, the time being graduated between the ages of two and seven. At four years it is wise to stop the daily map. The temperature of the room in which the child sleeps should be registered from 70 degrees Fahrenheit for the two-year-old to 55 degrees Fahrenheit for the two-year-old. The child should go to sleep alone, in a darkened room. The room where the child sleeps should contain at least 1000 cubic feet of air space; this is contained in a room measuring 10 feet by 10 feet, or its equivalent in size.

Air and Exercise

Keep the child out of doors all that is possible. If the weather is inclement, flush the house with fresh air until it registers a temperature of 60 degrees Fahrenheit, put on the child's wraps and let him play indoors. The room where the child plays should have no plumbing, if possible, and should, preferably, be heated by a fireplace. The exercise which the child gains through the right kind of play at this age has a most important effect upon his future health and strength.

All kinds of games, cacept competitive games, should be encouraged. The latter tax the child's developing nervous organization to such an extent that it sometimes results in a physical reaction in nervous indigestion. For this same reason, no child under seven should be allowed to ride a bicycle. His brain is not ready for the difficult process of concentration involved in the balancing. At this age, however, the child should exercise on a tricycle or a toy similar to the Irish mail. Any toy that has four wheels is also valuable. He may coast, swim, ride horseback, use toy horse reins, all kinds of balls, carts, a wheelbarrow. Any game that involves running should be encouraged. The child should play hard until his muscles, but not his nerves, are tired.

Disease

Disease

Disease which menaces the child at this time may be reduced to a minimum by the mother. She may learn, also, to detect any symptoms of disease, contagious or otherwise, early, and in time to summon quick medical help which will reduce the danger.

Three of the worst disease breeders can be fought best and most quickly by the mother.

Guard against melting snow.

The child's skin should be examined after the daily bath for any possible inflammation or eruption. The ears should be watched with special care. If an earache continues for more than a day, the fact should be reported to the family physician promptly. The condition may mean an infection or inflammatory condition and its dangerous accompaniment, a running ear.

The mouth and teeth demand mother watchfulness. Any condition of apparent mouth breathing or continued symptoms of 'cold in the head' should have a physician's attention as being symptoms of adenoids. The teeth should be cleaned twice a day, using a solution of boric acid or some other as pure an antiseptic. This cleansing, which the child will readily learn to do himself, should include the entire inside of the mouth and the gums, upper and under surfaces. These first teeth should be regularly inspected by a dentist; once every two months is not too often. Cavities in first seeth should be filled.

The eyes should be cleaned daily with a solution of boric acid. The child may be taught to do this cleansing himself with an eye glass and will learn to enjoy the after-effect of comfort which comes from the removal of any possible atoms of dust and the cool cleansing. The mother should watch for any possible inflammation about the region of the eyebrows or in the lining of the eyelids. Such a condition may be a foreruner of eye disease and stenediately reported to a physician.

The method of using the important little cyeglass is simple. It is filled to the brim with the boric acid solution and the eye is fitted closely into it. The head is tilted back, the eye opened and closed, and the aci

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Do you know of some good, kind old lady who loves children, and whose health maybe isn't of the best, who would like to come out on our farm for a few months this summer and fall. I prefer a woman fifty-five or sixty years old, and she would just have to work for her board and not help with the hard work such as washing and scrubbing. If she is a good hand at raising chickens she could have her share of the chickens. I intend this only for the good, and I thought someone from the city would be glad of a chance like this. I have three little girls, twelve, ten and six years old.

Yours truly,

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I am sending in some tested recipes which I hope you have space for, as I think the sisters will like them.

Am also enclosing a poem. Don't you think the sentiment is good? It makes me feel better just to read it. The world has need of more smiles. Each one of us should try to make this world a little brighter and more cheery. It takes but little effort, yet it is farreaching in effect. Just a pleasant look, a smile, a bow, a shake of the hand and a kind word excites an electric thrill and casts a ray of hope, health and sunshine into the hearts of the most despondent.

Yours for more smiles, MINNIE O. MACKINTOSH.

Minnie Mackintosh -There's a world of truth Minnie Mackintosh.—There's a world of truth in the poem you so kindly sent and we make space to print it. I've seen the time when an honest-to-goodness, straight-from-the-heart smile would have meant that much to me. And a smile today does lots more good than one day after tomorrow or some future time when, maybe, we do not need it quite so much—though they are acceptable at any time. Thanks for the recipes, too.—Ed.

A Pleasant Smile

"The thing that goes the farthest toward making life worth while,
That costs the least and does the most, is just a pleasant smile.
The smile that bubbles from a heart that loves its fellowmen
Will drive away the clouds of gloom and coax the sun again.

Two days afterward the great gates of Levallion Castle were opened wide to let out the funeral of the man who had been poisoned in his own house. Behind the hearse, before the long rows of country neighbors who came because they must and the flocking poor who came because the dead man had been good to them, walked the new Lord Levallion as chief mourner—and people stared as they saw Sir Thomas Annesley walking at his side. Sir Thomas, whose sister was a murderess, and lying in jail awaiting her committal for trial at the assizes.

"I wonder the boy can hold up," said Lord Chayter to his companion. "I honestly believe she didn't do it, though!" But when asked who did, he was silent.

Long and speechlessly the new Lord Levallion ctood by his cousin's grave. If there were men who would have spoken to him they dared not do it, so hard and hostile was his face. He turned without seeming to see his neighbors or the parson at his elbow; and to the surprise of every one drove off in the opposite direction from Levallion Castle.

Vallion Castle.

He was not needed there, Levallion's lawyer was in charge, and would remain so till it pleased Adrian Gordon to come back. There was no will to read, nothing to keep the heir from taking up nis immediate residence. Except that his wife's settlements and jointure were secured to her. Lord Levallion had arranged nothing. That consolation legacy to Adrian had never been made—or needed.

But all that was the last thing in Adrian's head as he drove to the station from that ghastliest thing on earth, the funeral of a murdered man.

inest thing on earth, the funeral of a murdered man.

In the last two days he had ransacked the village, but of a Mrs. Murray no one had ever heard. The landlord of the raw new bungalows had gone away; the caretaker gave a description of Miss Brown, the defaulting tenant, which did not tally in any respect with Hester Murray, except that Miss Brown had yellow hair.

Bad as Hester might be, he had never known her to drink; and the village girl who had waited on the tenant of the bungalow swore that two days out of three her mistress would drink herself into a heavy sleep. She said, also, that Miss Brown never left the house except to go into the garden; that at night, from her cottage nearby—for she had never slept in the house—she had always seen the drawing room lit up till all hours. And it was clear her story was true, for none of the village people had ever laid eyes on the levanting tenant during all the three months she had lived in the bungalow.

"That disposes of Hester," Adrian said to himself, "She could never have lived cooped up like that, She'd have scoured the country for excercise."

Levallion's lawyer, too, poohpoohed the idea, as me money.

The Girl He Loved

He shrugged his shoulders helplessly.

"What's she doing—Ravenel?" Tommy was on his feet, pale as Levallion up stairs.

"Nothing." Just slitting there like death. Go the her and see if you can make her cry. I couldn't make her even seem to hear me."

As the door closed behind the boy, Houghton turned to Adrian.

"It was to say good by I sent him," he said drearily. The warrant has come to arrest her. "She sha'n't go," cried Gordon blackly; but he knew he was talking mesense more there are the more than the stars in their course,"—bitterly—"he able to bail her out again."

He turned to the window because there were tears in his eyes, and so did not see that every trace of humanity had been wheel out of Adrian Gordon's countenance, as in a volce the like of them.

tally. "But I fail to see why you wear widow's weeds."

"Because, in my own eyes, I am his widow," she said. "You know that! Have you come here to insult me when I am heartbroken—or why?"

And to his astounding eyes there were the ravages of fearful grief in her face. But he was in no mood for pity.

"How dared you tell Lady Levallion, before her marriage," he said—and it was not what she had expected—"that 'Mrs. Gordon' was my wife?"

"Because Sylvia Annesley made me, threatened me. And I did it in ignorance. If I had known what I was doing, do you think I would have stirred a finger to help Levallion to marry—to marry!" bitterly.

"I suppose not. Well, it's-some small comfort to think you ruined yourself! Were you trying to undo your work by passing yourself off as Miss Brown, at Levallion?"

But the sudden question never jarred her; she had been ready for it, since for all she knew. Levallion might have told him. Her wide open eves opened innocently as she stared at him, and all the while it was sweeping over her acute brain that he was speaking by guesswork,

"I don't know what you mean!" she cried, in her clear, high voice, "I know nothing about any Miss Brown."

"Will you come down there and tell the care-taker you don't?" quietly.

"Will you come down there and tell the care-taker you don't?" quietly.
"Yes," said Hester Murray, just as quietly: "if taker you don't?" quietly.

"Yes," said Hester Murray, just as quietly; "if you can make me understand what you mean. Caretaker of what? and what has he to do with me? I have not been at Levallion Castle for three years, and you know it."

"You've been living within a mile of it all summer!"

Pale as a cheet all.

Summer:
Pale as a sheet, she stood up in front of him.
"Are you mad?" she said. "Would I—I that he discarded, shamed, ruined, go near him and his new—wife? Whoever your Miss Brown was, she was not I! I've been ill, poor, starving, nearly dying, till Levallion heard of it and sent me money."

"Have you been here all summer, then?" unconvinced.

"Have you been here all summer, then?"
It that unconvinced.

He terrified her till she could scarcely answer him, and if she did not satisfy him she was ruined. She shook her head.

"I've been in France, Boulogne," she said. "In head, a pension; you can write and ask them." And thanked Heaven she dared to play the desperate card, though only yesterday she had loathed the means that put it into her hand.

"Day before yesterday—the last few days?" doggedly.

"I've been here. Oh, Adrian! Why are you asking me such questions? If I had been at Levallion, could I have stayed away from—him?" Her low, broken voice, her puzzled msery, were perfect; and yet the man disbelieved in her because he knew her to be aliar.

"Do you expect me to believe it was not you who lived at Levallion, in that bungalow behind the village, all summer?" he said. "Because I think it was."

"It was not I. And if it had been, it is none of your affair."

Ifer change of tone startled him. He did not realize he had made a mistake when he said "think," instead of "know."

"Here," she said, and she wrote an address on a bit of paper. "Write to Boulogne and ask, And now tell me what your Miss Brown has been doing that you should think I was she?"

Her face was haggard as she waited for the answer, yet something in it warned Gordon that to answer her would be sheer madness.

"And.—I don't think I will."

"If you want it, you had better stay here till you hear from me. Do you understand?"

"Unless you hear from me—first," she said slowly. And he could not understand the mixture of triumph and fright that was in her face.

"What do you mean? You're powerless," he cried sharpfy.

"Yes." And for his life he did not know whether it was an assent or a question. He caught back the threat that was on his lips and went out.

out.

In the street he called himself every sort of fool. As if it had been written on the black, rainy sky, he saw that he had betrayed his suspicion of her and she had cleared herself and then defied him. He had accomplished absolutely nothing of what he meant to do,

"She means mischief," he said to the depths of his umbrella. "She's going to do something."

But just what Mrs. Murray had in her power never entered his brain.

"Don't cry, darling!" she whispered, as though

"Don't cry, darling!" she whispered, as though it had been he and not she that was in peril of life. "Oh, Tommy, I thought I would die for want of you!"

"They wouldn't let me come." He lifted his head. "Who's that?" he cried sharply. For a woman was sewing by the window.

"The matron," softly. "Did you think they'd let you see me alone?"

The woman looked up.

"Don't mind me, sir!" she cried, her hard face very gentle. "I'll not heed anything you say."

For Houghton, by good luck, was the prison doctor, and she believed in him as in the four Gospels.

"She's been very good to me," Ravenel said gratefully, and the matron smilled, but her eyes, were wet. For, if Lady Levallion were innoceat ten times over, she could not prove it. And the matron's only daughter who died would have been just the age of this girl, who presently would be tried for murder. She moved to the farthest limit of the room as the brother and sister sat down on the bed.

"Are you well, Tommy?" Ravenel whispered.
"You look so thin!"

"Never mind me; I'm all right." He grabbed at her hand. "I can only stay half an hour. Tell me, can't you think of anything I don't know?"

"Nothing," deliberately. For once having perjured herself because she had seen a flying glimpse of a man she thought was Adrian, there was nothing to do but stick by it. If she had been certain he was in London, she could have told the truth: but yet it would have helped her very little in face of those two bottles.

"You've seen your lawyer?"

She nodded. There had been little enough in that clever man's face to reassure her.

"Don't fret," she said slowly. "There are three weeks before I—my trial."

"And so far we haven't found out one thing," he said, and hid his face again.

"I've thought of something, though it can't help me," she began, smoothing the boy's rough hair. "The Umbrella, Tommy! She didn't send for me to tell me about that old story of Sylvia. She sent for me to warn me about Levallion. I feel it, and he did, too; else why did he say, before he died: 'We should have gone.'?

"But if it doesn't?" he gasped.

A dreadful shudder took her. To die, with a rope around her meck, in a prison-yard!

"Pray it will!" she cried. "Oh, Tommy, I know you'd help me if you could! But if you can't, pretend it's all right. It's the only thing you can do for me. I—I've got to be brave!"

The boy sat up, but he did not look at her.

"Look here," he said; "what do you think about Gordon?"

"It didn't do it!" quickly; for all her p

Lady Levallion had been committed for trial at the assizes, and, as Houghton had foreseen, was refused bail.

In the county jall at Valchampton she must stay alone, counfortless—a girl of nineteen; must be a month away from liberty and free air before her trial. Of after that Houghton dared not think. He worked wonders for her comfort, though, and instead of a cell she had a room, plain and bare, but still a room. Yet it seemed prisonlike enough to Sir Thomas Annesley, when it is cold smell of carbolic acid, till at last he had leave to go and see her.

Door after door was unlocked and locked behind his cold smell of carbolic acid, till at last he stood in the small room that was properly part of the jail infirmary, and heard its iron door click behind his heels.

"Tommy!" she cried, incredulous, rapturous, though she had known he was coming.

MRS. HOUSE A WIT.-When Colonel House, the distinguished American, was sent by President Wilson on a special mission to Berlin some little time before this country declared war, he took with him his wife, who is as witty as she is Even then the feeling in Germany against America was very bitter, and one day at a reception the wife of a High German official approached Mrs. House and said very rudely; "Germany will win this war. Then let America look out."

"How will Germany win?" said Mrs. House, quite calmly.

Soy Beans a Valuable Food

Soy beans have been used and liked in the United States for many years in those regions where they have been grown, and more recently have been used by canners to some extent for general trade. The war situation, with its need for finding new foods and new uses for old foods has fixed attention on this food crop to such as extent that the name soy bean has now become fairly familiar. fairly familiar.

fairly familiar.

The soy, bean, which is well known in the Orient as a valuable food staple, is unlike common legumes, in that it contains much oil and no starch. Oil is obtained by pressing it out of the beans. This leaves a press cake which still contains some oil and all the rest of the food material originally present in the beans. The cake is readily ground into flour, which is of high food value and can be used in many ways in cooking. It has been on the market to some extent for a long time and used for special purposes. It is now becoming a common foodstuff in some localities, one which is well worth knowing and using.

for 'plenty of hose to keep the flames from devouring us, and the pacifists, the mush heads and the dreamers reviled me, and yet if we had only tackled that fire a year earlier than we did it would be all out today, and instead of the bloody Hun devouring nation after nation and licking his gory chops with glee, monarchy would be a thing of the past, the sword would be benten into a ploughshare, German militarism and autocracy would be in its grave. When a man's house is on fire, it does not matter whether he is a republican, democrat or socialist, if he does not put out the fire, he will soon have no house, and if he does not hop out of the house in quick time he'll be a corpse. That in brief sums up the situation in this country today. This is the people's war and not a war of any political party. The only thing that counts now is whether we are to have a country, a national home in which we can work out our salvation and live up to whatever ideals of sovernment the majority of our citizens deem best for us and our loved ones, or whether we hear to go down into the dust (as the Russians for centuries went down under the heel of Genghis Khan, and the poor, wretched, martyred Armenians, have been for centuries forced to live under the yole of those fiends of hell the Turks) and become hewers of wood and drawers of water tor Hindenburg, the Prussian wild boar, and his bloody legions of baby killing buichers. The American people have scarcely awakened to the fact that we are at war, that is why the socialist is still chasing the capitalist and the profiteers big and small are still chasing the dollar. But wait until the Hun starts to chase the whole bunch of us, then the sapheads and dreamers will be so husy crawling into gopher holes, they will quit playing politics and be shedding tears of blood because they did not remember that the only "ism" worth while when one's country is attacked and when nations are crumbling and men are being slain by the millions, is patrlotized.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

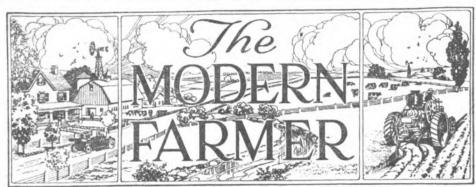

I have known you through your many excellent articles in Compost for quite a while, and we used to agree very well about everything but not about preparedness and war. Until two years ago I used to think you were wrong in your ideas about these things, but I do not think so any longer, as the war has taught me another lesson, and the best proof that I have changed my opinion is that last spring I went into this war myself as a volunteer. I slaways hated war and militarism and do yet, but I went into it because I think the best way to counteract and check these things is to see that the war will be fought thoroughly through to the very end. Another thing I now see clearly that this great war has in it a great lesson for mankind and that it had to come. It has proved a great eye opener and awakener. It compels us to think and proves that many of our precious ideas are rusty and corrupt. This war will make us believe more in toof than all the churches put together so that we can sing with Browning: "Perfect I call Thy plan, thanks that I was a man." I am a lover of the classics in Scandinavian and English literature, and I have a nice little collection of good books bomb in Montana. Excuse my English. I learned it mostly with self study on my homestead in the winter evenings, and after I was 44, years of ago. While the losses in this war have been terrible beyond expression we may at least comfort ourselves with the thought that they will usher in unparaleiled gains. With greetings from courseles, Americans and Canadians, Yours most sincerely.

Oscar Vourstan. DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Yours most sincerely, OSCAR VOOSTAD.

There is a letter from a real man, a man with a big heart and a white soul. I hate war as I hate hell: hate everything connected with it, but I knew this war was coming and knew we would have to take a part in it. Lincoln said that no nation could exist that was half slave and balf free, and I knew as the democratic spirit took deeper root in the hearts and souls of men, that autocracy and monarchy as exemplified by the two Kaisers of Germany and Austria and the ruling military caste of these countries would make one final and feroclous effort to retain their power and their privileges; that might would try and down right and the right of free men to life. Herty and the pursuit of happiness, and government by consent of the governed, would be challenged. The world could not exist half democratic and half autocratic. When Germany invaded Belgium she invaded the territory of every democratic country on earth and thrust her mailed fist into the face of every lover of freedom. All thought and hoped that the German socialist was animated by the revolutionary spirit, but he has betrayed his contrader the world over and has proved a willing tool of his imperial master. I warned you of what was coming and bade you prepare and Oscar Vogstad's letter and the terrible events of the last-(CONTINUED ON PAGE 16.)

Don't Pasture New Seeding

EVER before did we so plainly see the need of following this advice than this season, when field after field of new seeding clover is seen to have been winter-killed. Last fall feed was very high, as it is this year, and the temptation was very great to pasture the new clover and timothy on the grain stubbles. Men who knew befter and who never before had fallea to the temptation turned their cattle into the stubble fields, and let them pasture the new tender, nutritious clover plants. The result is that with the long, cold winter and lack of snow in many parts and repeated freezing and thawing of the unprotected ground the weakened clover plants winter-killed. We have seen field after field plowed up and seeded again to small grain. Considering that clover seed is at an "awful price" at present, the loss is a tremendous one, to say nothing of the loss of fertility which should be gathered by the cropped field when in clover this year and next.

Wise was the man who sowed four pounds of clover seed on every seers of his grantly area in a second of the loss of the complex conditions of the loss of the loss of fertility which should be gathered by the cropped field when in clover this year and next.

and next.

Wise was the man who sowed four pounds of clover seed on every acre of his small grain crop last year and this. That will bring up a fine stand of clover for fall-pasturage on land that is not intended to furnish the hay crop next year. Doing this the land is fertilized and the need of pasturing the new seeding for hay is obviated. It is an even better plan to sow some Essex rape with the grain crop, in addition to clover seeding, as the fall pasturage will be richer and better for the stock.

for the stock.

Den't make the mistake again this year of pasturing the new seeding of clover, timothy or alfalfa. Instead of that try to mulch such fields lightly with manure or even with straw as winter protection and added fertility. It will pay to do this. It is ruinous to take the other course.

Lice and Ringworm

Two new remedies have recently been proposed for these irritating pests of animals and may well be tried by our readers.

For the destruction or removal of lice a practical stockman advises the use of table salt, or even common salt, freely applied and rubbed in along the back bone and behind the ears, or on any part of the body most infested by lice. This certainly is a simple and safe treatment and may possibly have some virtue, but thus far we have not had a chance to give it a trial. It reminds us that salt similarly applied is said to be a good remedy for warble grubs in the backs of cattle. The salt is licked off by other cattle, and the licking, as well as the effects of the salt, may destroy the grubs. We prefer to squeeze out each ripe grub by pressing down upon the boil with the open mouth of a large bottle. Then destroy the grubs.

The new remedy for ringwarm is to wet each.

the open mouth of a large bottle. Then destroy the grubs.

The new remedy for ringworm is to wet each spot and rub in finely powdered calcium carbide, which is then to be washed off in thirty seconds. This is an English remedy and is worthy of trial with us. In this connection it should be remembered that the ringworm parasite, a vegetable one, lives on damp walls and woodwork as well as upon the skin and to get rid of the nuisance it is necessary to cleanse, disinfect and whitewash or paint such objects and all rubbing posts. Both lice and ringworm are most likely to infect stock kept in dark, dirty, warm and poorly ventilated basement stables.

Beware the Dirty Threshing Mill

Beware the Dirty Threshing Mill

One day last fall we saw a threshing mill at work on a crop of oats that had come from a field terribly dirty with quack grass. On the same farm the barley was equally foul. The shocks of grain were simply black with quack instead of golden with clean straw. The straw from these fields was baled and sold for city use. The grain we hope was not offered to anyone for seed, but we have no information as to that. It is certain, however, that the threshing mill coming from work-on such a foul farm will carry with it some weed seed to the next farm on which it is used. The community threshing outfit may thus carry and spread weed seed from farm to farm and we are certain that this happens in many a district every year.

For this reason, then, the threshing mill should be thoroughly cleaned before it is put to work on the next farm. Run straw through it for a while to shake out the weed seed. Have the threshermen cleanse the sieves and shakers and every part of the machine if it is known that the grain last threshed was foul with noxious weeds. It is well to feed the first bags of grain instead of keeping them for seed and the first chaff and short straw that comes through on starting the mill on the new farm should go into the mahure pile or feeding rack. A little care in this matter will save much work in trying to rid clean fields of "inherited" weed pests.

lack of transportation, dairy products have accumulated in the country until now cold storages and warehouses are "piled to the roof" with stored cheese and condensed milk. These will move of course when cars and ships can be had, since both are the best of concentrated foods for soldiers, but just now there is an excess supply; hence prices of milk are falling and prices of feeds still remain high. With the difficulty which they experience in getting good help, the farmers in the dairy sections are tempted to sell off their cows. This is further brought about by the high price of meat and the high price of veal. With good veal calves bringing fifteen or twenty dollars apiece, the farmer doesn't want to take the trouble to raise them.

What Is Likely to Happen is This: We will cut down our herds as they have done in France and England and Germany and in practically every other dairy country in the world. Then when the war is over, or before, we too will be short of dairy cattle. Already we have had opportunity to sell dairy cattle in large numbers to Europe, but could not ship them over on account of lack of boats. That the fields of Europe will be restocked with American cattle is now certain, provided we ourselves have the cattle to spare. After the war is over there will be a good market both for dairy cattle and for dairy products.

Stay In the Dairy Business is our advice to dairymen. Don't cut down the size of your herd products.

STAY IN THE DAIRY BUSINESS is our advice to dairymen. Don't cut down the size of your herd or sell off your heifer calves. The shortsighted fellow will do that, but the good dairyman should "stick" and increase his numbers if possible. This may be done by raising as much of his own feed as he possibly can, producing less milk if prices go too low and increasing his holding of young stock. If he has to sell anything, let it be the old and profitless cows.

Late Crops

What to do if corn fails—or help is so scarce that late planting must be used. These are questions doubly important this year to all farmers in the Northern states.

Backwheat

We are short of bread stuffs and must keep up our supply of bread crops. Much wheat was injured by winter killing and more will be hurt by bugs and rust. The wheat has already gone out of the country and it is still a long time until-harvest. The world needs a billion bushels of wheat from the United States this year, or four hundred million bushels more than we raised last year. Hence buckwheat is one of the most desirable catch crops that we can sow.

Buckwheat does well on almost any well drained soil, but particularly well on light sandy soils and new lands cleared too late for earlier crops. It may be sown as late as July 1st, in fact the last week in June is the accepted time in most of the buckwheat states. The Japanese variety is the most satisfactory. Practically the only enemy that buckwheat has is the blight occasioned by hot weather or the early frost.

Success with this crop then becomes more one of season than anything else. In a critical time like this the farmer can well afford to "take a chance" on the season and sow buckwheat.

Alfalfa

Alfalfa can well follow any small grain, rather wheat or oats. The stubble should be turned over and left for a few days for the weeds to sprout, then it should be thoroughly disked and harrowed and limed if necessary. It can ther be seeded with inoculated seed, using 15 to 20 pounds per acre. The Grimm variety has stood up the best in all Experiment Station tests.

While alfalfa will not add to our food crops this year, it will give to the farmer a cheap and abundant source of protein for next year's feeding. It has been a lack of this protein supply that has caused the excessively high price of feeds, the principal reason why it has cost so much to produce milk during the season just closed. By raising his own protein feed the farmer insures himself against either an unusual shortage of feed or a tie-up in transportation, both of which happened last winter, largely due to war conditions. to war conditions.

From one of our leading dairy states, there has recently come a builetin describing a new slage. It is claimed that this slage is much to be preferred to corn slage in regions where corn is an american crop on account of climatic states. The property of the corn slage is regions where the mess islage as follows:

Slage as follows:

Slage as follows:

Slage is made from hay made pp of a mixture of timothy, clover and affalfa. The first crop is used for slage, since it contains a large amount of the property of the property of the property of the property of the property. The first crop makes about ten tons of slage per acre. If the grass is cut very early in the moraing when the dew is on, there will be little need of running a stream of water into the little need of running a stream of out of the dry leaves by rain or dew and lost; hence it is very important to get hay under cover before it has been washed by rain or dew. Proba-bly the best plan is to cut hay in the afternoon or evening, leaving it to dry the next forenoon and get it into the barn before rain or dew has had a chance to fall on it after it is partially dry.

Cow Questions Answered

Here are some common questions that come to us about cows, the answers to which are of general interest and should be remembered by every farm boy and girl. The need of such information is necessary for the other day we saw a picture in a ladies' magazine depicting a cow with a full set of incisor teeth in her upper jaw as well as in the under jaw.

as well as in the under jaw.

4. What are incisor teeth?

A. These teeth are also called "nippers" or "pincher teeth" and are the ones in front of the mouth with which forage is bitten off. They have sharp cutting edges, whereas, the big broad grinding teeth in the back of the mouth, or sides of the jaw bones, have rough surfaces, and are called "molars."

rough surfaces, and are called "molars."

Q. How many incisors has the cow?

A. Eight incisors teeth are found on the lower jaw only. In place of upper incisor teeth the cow has a dental pad or hard palate against which the incisor teeth of the lower jaw press without cutting. The horse has six incisor teeth above and below and a sharp canine or bridle tooth midway between the incisors and molars above and below on each side of the mouth. In the cow the extra pair of incisors correspond to the canines, but are not apart from the six incisors.

of the horse of the cow differ from those of the horse of the cow differ from those of the horse?

A. The incisors of the cow have narrow necks, are shovel shaped and loose in the gums. They also project forward. These provisions are made to prevent the incisors from cutting the dental pad. The incisors of the horse have comparatively broad cutting and grinding surfaces are rigid and upright, as they contact one another from above and below.

Q. Does corn silage loosen the teeth of the couf.
A. No. The teeth naturally are loose, as here stated. Acid silage may help the teeth to more quickly become brittle or break off. It is not uncommon to find a twelve-year-old cow with only the liftle stumps or neeks of her inclsor teeth present. Such cows cannot properly gather grass into their mouths when it is brought to it by the tongue. The teeth should be sound if any animal is to thrive well.

Do cove ever need the attention of a veterinary t as do horses?

A. Yes; although this fact is not generally understood. The milk tooth crowns of in-coming molar teeth (premolars) often lodge or fail to come off and may stick between the molars and cheeks or tongue. Such shells or crowns are a common cause of lack of thrift in two-year-old cattle and should be removed. This is easily accomplished by means of a pair of forceps. Sharp points and split and diseased molar teeth also may cause ill-thrift and should be extracted, but it is the young growing cattle that most often need attention from the dentist.

Q. What is "hollow horn?"

A. It is a term applied by ignorant and superstitions people to a mythical disease of cattle. The horns of all adult cattle are hollow. Pus sometimes works its way into the hollow base of the horn when a cow is suffering from malignant catarrh and that may be the supposed disease referred to as "hollow horn." It is unnecessary and useless to bore holes in the horns and insert drugs of any kind.

Q. How can the age of cattle be told from the horne? A. A ring forms at the base of the horn for each year of the life after three years. Figure that the smooth point of the horn represents three years and add one year for each ring, counting from the head. Aged cattle have a very deep depression in the horn near the head.

Aged cattle have a very deep depression in the horn near the head.

Q. De cattle "lose the cudt"

A. No. Chewing of the cud, or rumination, is the natural act of bringing food back into the mouth to be more thoroughly chewed and acted upon by sallva. When a cow stops ruminating she is sick. When she recovers, rumination is resumed. Suppression of cud chewing then is a symptom of sickness, and providing an artificial cud of salt pork, or other concections, or a red herring cannot cure the sickness. Sometimes the salt makes a cow work her tongue, sallva then flows and rumination may consequently be encouraged. Usually that is temporary, unless the cow is about well and rumination is about to recur at the time the prepared "cud" is administered.

Q. Is there such a disease as "wolf in the tail"? and what are "wolves" in the hide?

A. No. The belief in this myth and in "hollow horn" is fast dying out. It is most commonly believed in at the South. The "wolf" in the tail is supposed to be a worm that eats the bone. Maggots or screw worms possibly may form in a wounded or discrement the end of the tail, nor is splitting of the tail and inserting of salt, garlic and such things necessary or helpful. The soft spot simply is due to pulling apart of the small bones of the tail. "Wolves" under the skin of the back are grubs (larvæ) of the ox warble fly.

Q. Are twin heifer calves barren from birth?

A. No. When a bull and a heifer are born as

Q. Are twin heifer calves barren from birth?
A. No. When a bull and a heifer are born as twins, the female commonly is barren, but the male is fertile. Female twins are fertile. The barren heifer is termed a "free martin" and commonly is a hermaphrodite.

Q. Are "wolves" ever found in the womb

A. No. The red, fleshy, or mushroom-like objects projecting from the lining membrane of the womb, and which sometimes are torn off in removing the after-birth or "cleansing," are cotyledons to which the placental membrane of afterbirth adheres and through which the fetus receives its nourishment in the womb.

as July or August with good results. While they are primarily a stock feed they yield heavily and are used extensively as human food.

Millet

The millets are of especial value as hay crops in case of hay shortage. In most states they do well and can follow a corn failure or an early harvest of winter wheat. The Hungarian millet is preferred, sown at the rate of 40 pounds per acre, either broadcast or in drills, While it is desirable that the seeding be done in June, early July is all right if the weather is not too dry and hot.

Q. When a pure-bred-gred, politered black cow is said to have been mated with a bull of like color and breed and produces a red calf, can the seller of the cow be held responsible and made to pay domages?

*A. No. Red was once a natural color of the Aberdeen-Angus breed and a cow of that breed may throw a red calf at any time although the sire is black. This is termed "atayism," or harking back to the lost "scur" hors may appear upon a pure-bred polled calf and a horse occasionally is born with three hoofs on one leg. For A Club Of Only Two!

THIS offer is for the woman and girl who" loves her crocheting" and insists upon having the beat of everything to work with. In this outfit we give you any desired quantity of Dexter Cordonnette "Silko" crochet and tatting cotton, and three of the highest grade crochet needles. There is no better crochet and tatting cotton than Dexter "Silko"—a fact already known to thousands of our women readers. It is made of the best Sea Island cotton with a twist that makes it lie flat, is highly mercerized and actually improves with washing. It is smooth to the fingers and will not kink. With Dexter "Silko," crocheting is more easily done—and the finished pieces are far more beautiful and useful than if made with cheaper grade cotton. Dexter "Silko" for crocheting comes in all the popular colors—white, ecru, pink, rose pink, light blue, delph blue, king blue, aspphire and sea green, and in sizes 3, 10, 30, 50 and 70. The tatting cotton comes in the same colors and of the size always used for this work.

The three steel crochet needles are the finest made, 5 inches long, nickel plated, perfectly formed and balanced, with flattened finger hold, and a nickel cap that slips on over the end, protecting it when not in use. This cap also prevents the sharp point from doing any damage when earried in the pocket, handbag or work basket. We give you three different sizes of needles—8: 10 and 12.

We believe that our crochet workers will appreciate this offer, as it means a considerable saving to be able to secure such an outfit as this without expense. We shall send you the complete outfit, also additional quantities of the crocheting and tatting cotton, on the terms of the following special offers:

War Thrift Stamps!

How You Can Help Your Country-And Save Money Too-Without Expense To Yourself!

Do you want to help win the war but feel financially unable to buy Liberty Bonds or War Thrift Stamps?

Here then is your opportunity to do your bit and yet not invest a cent of your own money. COMFORT is willing to buy 25-Cent War Thrift Stamps and give them to you in place of a premium or cash commission. By following our easy plan you will soon have enough Stamps to fill a Thrift Card. Then you can start all over again and fill another Card—and so on. In this way you can without expense to yourself, help furnish your Country with the money it needs in order to feed, clothe, arm and equip our soldiers and sailors and win this righteous war in defense of American honor and the cause of democracy throughout the world.

Thrift Stamps—What Are They?

Thrift Stamps—What Are They?

United States 25-Cent War Thrift Stamps are the best investment in the World. They are the equivalent of War Savings Stamps, also called "little beby bonds." which—like Liberty Bonds—have behind them the entire resources of the United States.

These Thrift Stamps themselves bear no interest, but they can be exchanged for the larger War-Savings Stamps which do bear interest. When you have filled your Thrift Card with sixteen 25-Cent Thrift Stamps, you are to surrender it to any post office, bank or other authorized agency, pay a few cents in cash—17 cents in June, 18 cents in July, and so on, adding 1 cent each month—and receive in return a $5 War-Savings Stamp. With this Stamp you will also receive a War-Savings Certificate, containing spaces for twenty of these $5 War-Savings Stamps. If you should fill the twenty spaces with $5 War-Savings Stamps before July 1, 1913, the cost to you—if you bought the stamps—would be $83.40, and on Jan. 1, 1923, the Government will pay you $100—a net profit of $16.60. In other words your War-Savings Stamps—which you get in exchange for your 25-Cent Thrift Stamps—will bear 4 per cent. Interest, compounded quarterly. Please understand, however, that you are not obliged to fill your War-Savings Certificates before July 1, 1918. We simply use that date to Illustrate what the stamps bring you in interest. You actually have until Jan. 1, 1919, to purchase the stamps. But of course the sooner you secure them the more you will gain in interest on your investment. Therefore it's up to you to fill your Thrift Cards with 25-Cent Thrift Stamps as soon as possible, in order to exchange them for the larger $5 War-Savings Stamps that pay you 4 per cent. Interest, compounded quarterly, from Jan. 2, 1918.

You Can Help Win The War By Starting A Thrift Card Today!

Every 25-Cent Thrift Stamp which you buy, or secure free on this effer, strikes a blew at our enemies and hastens the victorious ending of the war. And at the same time you are investing money in the best and safest security in the world. We consider it our duty to describe this. An Army of Poultry Raisers Called Poultry Industry, with an Advisory Board to look after the interests of the producer and to cooperate in all government activities wherein the producer of poultry is involved in any way. A resolution was adopted requesting the Secretary of Agriculture and the Food Administrator to add a representative of the poultry industry to serve on the Farmers' Committee of Twenty-Four.

The Board decided to maintain a fixed office at Washington during the period of the war. A. G. Philips was chosen president of the War Emergency Federated Poultry Industry, and E. E. Richards treasurer, chairman of the Advisory Board, and secretary of the Federated Poultry Industry. There will be a "War Emergency Committee" in each State to co-operate in support of the program of the Federation.

We all know that to win the war the men who are fighting must have food. We must send them beef, pork, wheat, and like things that will stand the long trip across the water and keep in good condition, so America will have to depend largely cated by the thick pelvic arch and a hard abdomen. In the laying hen the ischial bones of the pelvic arch are thin. In the heavy laying hen there is noted bleached shanks, beak, earlobes, eyelids and vent.

The yellow color is due to xanthophyll, which occurs principally in the green feed; thus the more green feed the bird consumes, the slower will be the bleaching of the parts when the laying period begins. In the heavy laying hen the capacity will be indicated by the distance from the posterior point of the breast bone to the pelvic arch, which should be three or four fingers' breadth, and the pubic bones in the region of the vent should be two to three fingers in breadth. In the non-layer these pubic bones may be scarcely one finger's breadth apart.

one finger's breadth apart.

And when on the job of culling, don't forget that there are many advantages in the capon over the ordinary roasting fowl. He is much larger, attains weight more cheaply, is always in demand because of a large carcass, and sells for from ten to twelve cents a pound higher than the rooster because of the quality of the meat. After cockerels have reached the age of four and a half to five months they become quarrelsome, and are hard to keep in flocks of more than four or five, whereas capons can be kept in large flocks and are as docile as a flock of pullets. Being inactive, they put on weight rapidly, and although their bodies reach an enormous size, they never become tough.

It is not advisable to caponize the lighter breeds, such as the Leghorns, etc., as the large carcass can never be obtained from such fowls. The American type, such as the Plymouth Rock, Rhode Island Red and Wayndotts and the interest.

We all know that to win the war the men who are fighting must have food. We must send them beef, pork, wheat, and like things that will stand the long trip across the water and keep in good condition, so America will have to depend largely on poultry and eggs to take the place of meat, and if chicks and eggs are to be produced in sufficient amounts, it will be only because the American farmer, together with his family, keep faithfully at work.

Culling is the important work just at this season, for, with the present price of feed, no one can afford to keep "deadheads." As soon as hens stop laying in July, clear them out to make way for pullets.

The indications that a bird is physically qualified to produce eggs are—a clear, full, bright eyet the eyelids wide open and not sluggish; a good strong pair of shanks, with straight, well-worn toenalls showing constant use in scratching. Only a healthy fowl is a laying fowl, and such a bird must of necessity have a good appetite. A hen that is laying has an enlarged abdomen, due to the enlarged intestines, ovary, and oviduct, and the body is deeper at the rear than at the front of the keel. These points are not so well marked when the hen ceases laying.

In the non-laying hen there is likely to be an unusual accumulation of fat in the abdomen and of the keed. These points are not so well marked when the hen ceases laying.

germs into the liver, when numerous centers of the disease appear, and show yellowish spots, which, when cut across, will be found to be irregularly globular in shape. It is not positively known whether the germs of these diseases are present in the eggs laid by affected hens or turkeys, but there is no doubt that they are present on the shell, which collects the germs as the egg passes through the egg passage from the bird. It is for this reason that all eggs should be wiped with alcohol before being put under hens or in incubators. The germs of the above diseases are apt to linger in incubators and brooders, and frequently originate in old hay, moldy ground or other waste matter. So as a matter of prevention, incubators should be disinfected after each hatch, and brooders before each new lot of chicks is put into them, and nesting material for setting hens should be clean, sweet hay. As you have a good flock of hens, it seems a pity to part with them, and really not necessary, if you will work along the lines of prevention during the coming fall and winter. Thoroughly clean and disinfect all the houses at frequent intervals Have the gards or ground where the hens are in the habit of congregating covered with fresh lime, which should be turned under after twenty-four hours. If it is possible to seed the ground, so much the better—it will sweeten it. As soon as you stop using eggs for hatching, add a thimbleful of permanganate of potassium to every four quarts of drinking water, until November. This will kill the germs which the hens may be carrying. For young chicks once attacked there is no cure, though giving them sour milk to drink from the time they are hatched is supposed to act as a preventive.

they are hatched is supposed to act as a preventive.

E. B.—From your description of the liver and lungs after death, there is little doubt that the fowls were suffering from tuberculosis, which is very contagious, and so difficult to detect in the early stages that it is almost impossible to cure as the vital organs are usually past repair before dectoring starts. The only safe way to eradicate the trouble is to get rid of all your present stock. Thoroughly disinfect the premises, plow up all ground in the vicinity of the chickes houses, and seed to oats, rye, or any quick-growing crop, then start with an entirely new strain of birds.

I. R. T.—I cannot understand the condition you de-crop, then start with an entirely new strain of birds.

J. R. T.—I cannot understand the condition you describe with your incubator chicks, unless you allowed the heat to run up and down very suddenly during the period of incubation. You ask if it could be caused by the shaking of the incubator. Yes; it certainly could. An incubator should stand firmly and evenly, where there is no danger of its receiving jerks or shakes. Before Setting the machine again, I advise you to thoroughly study the directions which came with it, and refer to COMFORT of last January and February.

If You Are A Woman Who Loves Crochet And Tatting Here Is A Set Of Books You Will Be Delighted To Own!

Of Books You Will Be Delighted To Own!

Any One of these books alone is a veritable treasure house of the newest, most beautiful designs. The seven books combined form a complete library in which you will find any pattern in crocheting and tatting you could possibly ask for. You will fairly revel in the many handsome designs shown. There are edgings, beadings, insertions and laces for every conceivable use. The illustrations are actual photographs of the finished work and show every thread so plainly that they are almost as good to work from as the directions themselves. The directions are adapted for either beginner or expert. They tell stitch by stitch how each pattern is worked, also the quantity and size of material required and the correct sizes of hooks to be used. Following is a description of each book. They are 8 by 10 1-2 inches in size with the exception of Volume I which is 9 1-2 by 12 inches. Please order by numbers.

Volume 1 Crocheted yokes for combinations, envelopes, nightgowns, cornet, covers, etc.—Afteen all different, exquisite designs.

Volume 2 Handsome crocheted edgings and insertions suitable for handker-chiefs, underwear, dresses and a multitude of other uses,—thirty-three different designs.

Volume 3 Eighteen lovely designs in Cluny insertions and laces for centerpieces, library searfs, boudoir caps, corset cover yokes, piano scarfs, curtains, chemises, envelopes or combination suits.

Volume 4 Twenty-five handsome designs in caps, candle shades, baby bonnets, bedspreads, dollies, library scarfs, pillows, centerpieces, portiere, medallions, curtains, etc., etc.

Volume 5 Twenty-five designs in novelty and clover leaf crocheted yokes, primrose and sunflower yokes; dollies, centerpieces, boudoir caps unique edges and insertions for serving trays; novelty aprons and collars.

Volume 6 Thirty-two designs in tatting. Maltese and Irish crochet.—a varied and beautiful assortment of tatted handkerchief edges, edgings and insertions, tatted yokes, boundoir caps, towel edges, medallions; yokes, breakfast caps, centerpieces, edgings and lace in Maltese crochet and yokes in Irish crochet.

Volume 7 Thirty handsome novelty crocheted designs including rose, sunflower periwinkle, and Venetian yokes; boudoir caps, monkey face library scarf, and lace pillow; large and small baskets, hat pin holder, jewel box, vanity tray coin purse, utility bag, starfish dolly, pineappie centerpiece; edgings and insertions in pillow lace; daisy edging; spider, bell, riok-rack, novelty and coronation braid laces.

The Hair in Summer

UMMER is here, girls, and it behooves us to give a little extra thought to our toilets, else we run the risk of not seeming as neat and sweet as we mean to be. Perhaps the first thing which should engage our attention is our hair. Summer hair, let me warn you, is a real responsibility. The shampoos which are sufficient to keep the hair clean in winter, when the scalp is dry and does not accumulate dust, are too few in summer. The big thing to remember about hair, at any season of the year, is that when it is not clean is the time to wash it, no matter when you had your last shampoo.

Since, however, too frequent shampoos are drying to the hair, you should exercise all the care possible to keep it clean for the regulation period between shampoos—which, for oily hair, is two weeks; for dry hair, three weeks.

The big agent of uncleanliness in summer is perspiration, and of course the scalp perspires almost as freely as the rest of the body. We can remove the clothes from the body, and air and bathe it, once or twice a day; but the hair which clothes the scalp cannot be removed, alas! for any such purpose. We can, however, air our hair and should do so at least once a day.

On arising in the morning (of course you have slept with the hair very loosely braided), unbraid the hair and shake it out. Rub the loose hair between the folds of a Turkish bath towel and give the scalp a brisk toweling as well. Stand by an open window and toss the hair here and there, letting the breezes blow on every portion of the scalp. Let it hang loose while dressing, and until just before you don your morning frock. It needs a good brisk brushing, with a tossing motion, before you arrange it as you are accustomed to wear it.

In the afternoon, while you are changing your dress, let the hair down again, rub thoroughly writh a beth term to the proper and the part and air an with a bath towel to dry scalp and hair, and air and brush as before.

Do not make the mistake of shaking powder into the hair. It will dry, to be sure, but it yill also clog the scalp, cause irritation, dandruff, and often, later, excessive oiliness.

If you keep the scalp perfectly sweet and fresh, you may add a dainty touch by adding a fillet about the head, made of a narrow ribbon with a lining of another ribbon stitched to it, sachet powder being sprinkled between the two ribbon layers. A small flat two-inch pad of ribbon made in the same way, with no wadding, but a very little sachet powder folded in a layer of tissue and laid between the ribbons before stitching, can be used instead of the ribbon fillet, if it is made of silk the color of the hair and slipped under the back coil of hair or concealed beneath the hair that rolls away from the forehead. Beware of perfumes, however, if the scalp is not perfectly fresh and sweet, otherwise instead of the delicate fragrance you expect, there will be a musty odor not at all pleasant to encounter.

Brush your hair one hundred strokes at night by an open window to remove all soil of the day and let the air reach every portion of the scalp. And be sure your brush is not only clean but bone-dry before using.

When dressing the hair for the day or the occasion, put it up very carefully, using plenty of invisible pins to keep stray locks in order, and to shape becomingly the way the hair lies upon the head. Then, once well dressed, try not to fuss with it before next hair-dressing time. Do not wear a hat too long at a time, as it heats the head. Go hatless (with the hair protected by a loosely sun.

Next month we will talk about other ways of keeping dainty in summer.

Answers to Questions

Bive Eyes.—Oh, my dear! "Get short and fat within a week"? I am afraid that is too big a contract for me to undertake. And I wonder if you wouldn't be sorry if I really did it for you. To be "tall and slim" is ever so much nicer than to be short and fat, and you would soon be asking me to change you back again. It isn't a bit fashionable to be fat, my dear, and all the women I know would give a great deal to be able to say they were tall and slim. So be very grateful, and tell your friends that you wouldn't change for anything. If, however, you have quite decided that you want to welgh a few more pounds, eat plenty of potatoes, rice, milk, cream, sugar on your oatmeal, butter on your bread. These are all fat-making foods. Avoid pickles and sour relishes. Exercise every day, walk in the open air, play tennis, row, swim, or do any other outdoor thing which is possible where you live. And drink about eight to ten glasses of water a day. Also see that your bowels are kept in excellent condition daily. But don't expect to get fat in a work. It will take a good many weeks. The quickest way is to take the milk diet, for which I have given directions many times in Comport; on that diet you can gain from one to three pounds a week—sometimes more.

If you are roundshouldered, that probably means that you are not careful to sit erect, but read or study three pounds a week—sometimes more.

If you are roundshouldered, that probably means that you are not careful to sit erect, but read or study or do other things all bent over. Whenever you seat yourself, be sure that the end of your spine touches the back of the chair, and that the back is kept erect, not bent. You can lean back against the chair if you want, but keeping the back perfectly straight; if you bend forward, let it be from the hips and not bending at the waist. A good exercise for you to practice is as follows:

For Round Shoulders

Stand with heels together, toes out, shoulders dropped, chin up. Raise your arms until they are straight in front of you on a level with your shoulders, palms touching. Now throw the arms back violently, without bending the elbows, as if trying to make them meet in the middle of the back. Be sure not to left them fall below the level of the shoulders. You probably will not be able to throw them very far back, at first, if you are already stoopshouldered, but practice this tiry our are already stoopshouldered, but practice this certain and the property of the probably and the stood and thought of its mistress sitting on her pallet bed in Valehampton jail.

In walking, hold chin up, straighten back, and drop shoulders. Do not throw shoulders sharply back, as that merely makes a bad shoulder line, but let them drop easily, at the same time raising the chest.

time raising the chest.

HOPE.—Here you are, thinking 121 pounds is too much to weigh, and just above you is "Blue Eyes," who is distressed because she is tall and slim. Pretty hard, isn't it, to satisfy everybody? You do not tell me how tall you are, so I cannot tell whether 121 is too much or too little. My guess would be that it is not an ounce too much. It may be that your legs are too fat in proportion to the rest of the body, since you seem to complain most about them. If that is the case, I suggest that you practice the following exercise:

To Reduce Calves of Legs

Stand with heels together, hands on hips, back erect, and chin up. Now rise on the toes until you are on the very tips, and remain there for a second, letting yourself down again very, very slowly indeed. This will strain the leg muscles and help to reduce the flesh. If you let yourself down too quickly, the muscles are not strained enough to do any good.

Another good exercise is to take same position, rise on toes, and then bend knees and sink to squatting position, with heels not touching floor, and with back perfectly straight. Rise to standing position again, sink to squatting position, and repeat ten or fifteen times.

perfectly straight. Rise to standing position again, sink to squatting position, and repeat ten or fifteen times.

UTAH.—If your skin breaks out first and then the skin scales off, the first thing for you to do is to look to your diet. Nearly everything in the nature of an eruption starts with a stomach condition. Cut out too many sweets, rich gravies, or desserts, sait or dried meats and fish, and eat plenty of green vegetables and fruits, and if possible chicken and fresh fish. At this season of the year you can select an ideal diet; you can choose between asparagus, string beans, peas, carrots, beets, lettuce, onlons, cabbage, okra, spinach (most excellent for you; I wish you would eat it at least twice a week; any other kind of greens is equally good), summer squash, etc. You have the summer berries, and later peaches and apricots and pears, to say nothing of melons, which are particularly good. In default of fresh fruits, you can eat baked apples, stewed prunes or apricots (soaked over night in cold water, after washing, and then cooked very slowly for a long time in the water in which they have soaked. You must drink plenty of water (see answer to "Blue Eyes), and above all things you must see that your bowels move freely daily. If you will eat prunes every morning for breakfast, drink eight to ten glasses of water daily, and exercise every day (the squatting exercise given to "Hope" will be good for you), this will take care of itself. Get a good pure face cream and after bathing the face in hot soapy water at night, rinsing in warm water, then in cool, rub in the cold cream and leave on all night. In the morning wash in tepid water. Do not use soap on the face except at night. The green liquid soap you can get at the drugstore would be a good soap for you, although any of the white household soaps are also good. Do not use powder on the face without first applying cold cream, well rubbed in, and wiping off any surplus with a pad of absorbent cotton. With these precautions, I think you will soon find you

"Time's up, sir," said the warden.

It did not seem five minutes, but it was nearer forty than thirty.

"I'll come," said Sir Thomas Annesley, and he looked ten years older. "Ravenel, I nearly forgot. The duchess wrote to me. She's coming here, to Valehampton, to be near you. She'll come here as often as they'll let her."

"I'm glad," simply. "But I think I only want you." (And one other, whose hand she would never touch again in life!)

She sat down, tearless. One breast, of all the world, she could have hidden her face against; one strong shoulder would have known her tears. But between Adrian Gordon and her was a deep gulf set; a gulf of blood that cried aloud. But Tommy Annesley was blind with tears as he drove the long ten miles between Valehampton and Levallion Castle. It was bitter work staying there eating Adrian's bread; but he could not go away.

rambled aimlessly, he hardly saw where. Jacobs, for once, was not with him; all alone, his hands in his pockets, his slow feet silent on the frozen grass, Sir Thomas walked mechanically, racking his brain to no purpose over that mysterious man and woman the detectives had been unable to and woman the detectives had been unable to trace.

He might have racked his brain still harder if he-had known the reason of the silence that reigned concerning them. In Adrian's theory about the absconding tenant of the buggalow, no one believed at all. Arlington's man had been almost openly unbelieving about dragging a strange woman into the case, and the prosecution merely smiled at the idea of there being any mystery whatever, thanks to that hasty evidence of Sir Thomas Annesley's. It was all very well for him to believe he had made a mistake; no one else did. In the eyes of the world, those two people who drank champagne in a wood had been Captain Gordon and Lady Levallion, since the only man who could have sworn to her whereabouts was dead!

"If I only could think of something!" the boy mused desperately, and stopped short at a queer sound.

He had wandered into the dark kitchen-garden, behind a row of deserted potting sheds; and from them came a sound exactly like the beating of carpets. His thoughts flew to the absent Jacobs, and the cook who had a grudge the absent Jacobs, and the cook who had a grudge against him.

Silent, with flying feet, Tommy ran to the back of the shed, full of fury. But as he paused by the latticed, glassless window at the back of it, he knew it was no dog which was concerned in the carpet-beating, but a boy.

"Don't! don't!" he was crying. I won't go away. I'll stay with you. I'll do whatever you say!"

The sound of blows ceased.

"That is a sensible, amiable boy!" said a voice, and it was the chef's. "And you will say to the world that you love me—that there was never any one like me, eh?"

The boy groaned.

"Yes!"

"Thomas heard the whistle of a stick up-

Sir Thomas heard the whistle of a stick uplifted.
"Oh, yes! Don't hit me."
"It is for your good that I break the bones in "What the devil's this?" he said fiercely, and a lighted match flickered in his hand.

the boot-boy, quivering with pain. The match went out.

"How dare you beat the boy fike that?" cried Tommy, "I'll have you up for assault."

"He disobeyed me, refused to do his work."

In the dark, Carrousel's boot grazed the boy's ribs. "Did you not, eh?"

"Yes." The answer was little better than a moan.

moan.

"I don't see what a cook has to do with blacking boots!" angrily. "And if he disobeyed you a dozen times, you've no right to beat him like this." "I don't see what a cook has to do with blacking boots!" angrily. "And if he disobeyed you a dozen times, you've no right to beat him like this."

"He runs my errands," said Carrousel, sullenly. "He would not do his work; he played, idled." "You get out of this and let him alone," authoritatively. "And if I catch you at this again, I'll have you arrested. Go now, sharp! My dog'll be here in a minute," significantly. "You threaten me—intimidate?" In the dark, Carrousel's face was not pretty. But like lightning he changed his tone.
"I regret if you think the punishment too severe. The boy—earned it!" He spoke like oil, and in the dark stooped and whispered two words in the boot-boy's ear.

"Clear out!" Tommy stamped his foot, unconscious of that whisper. "Get back to your pots and pans, or I'll have you driven there. Jacobs! Hi, Jacobs!" he yelled.

But Monsieur Carrousel was gone.
Tommy stooped over the boot-boy.
"Why did you let him beat you like that?" he said. "Why didn't you yell?"

But he got po answer. Another match flickered in the shed. Towers, the boot-boy, was lying on his face, shaking with sobs.
"See here," said Tommy, "don't! Here's half a crown for you"—his last coin—"if you couldn't fight that beast why didn't you complain if he ill-treated you? Has he done it before?"

No answer.
"Well," disgustedly, "if you won't tell, I shall! I'll have Carrousel hauled up."
Towers said something; caught at Tommy in the dark, as if to stop him.
"Don't!" he gasped. "Don't sir! He'd kill me."

OF all indoor foliage plants, none give more lasting pleasure and satisfaction than these popular house ferns. They need but little care and five indefinitely, growing larger and more beautiful year by year. The collection offered you here comprise four of the largest, handsomest varieties ever grown for house culture. They are the Apparagus Plumesus or "Lace" fern, the Roosevelt, the Boston or "Fountain" fern and the Whitmani or "Ostrich plume" fern. They will thrive in any dwelling room near a window and require almost no attention except a little sprinkling of water now and then. These ferns are guaranteed to be absolutely free from all injurious insects or diseases which destroy foliage plants of this type, and they will be packed carefully and mailed to you by Parcel Post so that you will be sure to receive them in just as good condition as though they were fresh from the greenhouse. We are able to illustrate only one variety, "The Roosevelt," but remember you get all four ferns free on this offer.

Birth-stone Rings

Guaranteed For 5 Years

For A Club Of Two!

THE most popular lady's rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only is teonsidered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly atylish. We are able to filustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different-stone for each month of the year and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones, the month to which one applies and its symbol.

Each ring is guaranteed genuine 12-Karat gold filled which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems.

The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Fiffany" style. As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister nothing could be more appropriate and accept-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. And not only the women and girls but men and boys as well are now wearing them.

Please do not class these rings with the cheap "electro-plated" rings that turn brassy after they have been worn a month or two. Remember that every one of them is guaranteed to be 12-Karat gold-filled and positively warranted for five years. If you want a handsome birthstone ring for yourself or some dear friend or relative you will make no mistake in taking advantage of this offer at once. When ordering be sure to specify the size and number of ring wanted. You can easily tell just what size ring you wear by following the directions at the right.

For two one-tions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, mailed on or before June 30, we will send you one of these beautiful gold-filled birthstone rings by parcel post prepaid. After June 30, we will send you one ring for two one-year subscriptions at 35 cents each. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted. Address ed. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Me.

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

HIDEBOUND COW.—I have a cow that is hidebound. She gives three gallons of milk a day and cats heartily, though she looks badly. Mrs. S. W. A.—Tuberculosis in all probability is the cause of the hidebound condition and emaciation and if the disease is present the milk is dangerous for use. You should have a qualified veterinarian apply the tuberculin test. Under the circumstances we should not feel justified in prescribing treatment, as the cow may have a dangerous disease. Do not use her milk unless she passes the test.

BLOODY MILK.—My cow three years old lest spring.

she passes the test.

BLOODY MILK.—My cow, three years old last spring, has her first calf. Blood comes from the front teat on the left side.

A.—A growth in the teat doubtless bleeds from irritation at milking time. A skilled surgeon possibly may be able to remove the growth by operation. If that cannot be done it would be best to dry off the milk secretion in the affected quarter.

milk secretion in the affected quarter.

EPILEPSY.—My horse has what appears to be fits on certain changes of the moon. He turns around and around until he falls, trembling all over. His head draws back, and when he gets up appears blind for a few minutes. He is seven years old and a good worker.

B. W. P.

A.—This is a brain and nerve trouble and is incurable. The fits will be less likely to occur if you never let the horse stand for a single day without work or exercise. See that the collar fits. The horse might work better in a breast collar. Keep the bowels active.

Callous.—I have a six-year-old mare which were might work better in a breast collar. Keep the bowels active.

CALLOUS.—I have a six-year-old mare, which was rope burned last fall on the back side of one hind leg, just above the hoof. While it has healed and does not seem to hurt, there is a growth about the size of a man's index finger. Can you suggest anything that will remove it?

A.—It is unlikely that the callous can be removed without operating. Try the effects of lodine ointment rubbed in once daily.

FALLING HORSE.—My horse, three years old, will lie down and not get up for some little time. In trotting he will fall down and lie for ten minutes.

A.—Allow the horse a roomy box stall in the stable. If he then becomes cast it will be necessary to put slings under him at night. Feed him well to keep up his strength. Lampas merely indicates that the teeth need attention from a competent veterinarian. Feed old ear corn, and twice daily rub the swelling with a block of alum. Describe a case of what you term 'distemper' and we will be glad to prescribe treatment. Say whether it is a dog or horse that is affected.

HIDEBOUND COW.—I have a cow; her hide is tight.
I have been breaking it loose for three months and it isn't any looser.

A.—This is a constitutional trouble, so that local treatment will not help. It is quite possible that the cow has tuberculosis, so have her tested with tuberculin to find out. Meanwhile, feed one pound of flaxseed meal twice a day along with wheat bran, corn and grass or clover and alfalfa hay.

and grass or clover and alfalfa hay.

COUGH.—My mare coughs when she pulls or trots, but not much when standing in the stable. There is no discharge from the nose. Mas. F. M.

A.—Wet all feed, after having her teeth put in order by a veterinarian. If she has no fever she may be worked. If the cough persists, give half an ounce of glyco-heroin, or equine syrup three times a day and if necessary increase the dose. The causes of cough are so many and different that we cannot assign the exact cause without making an examination.

exact cause without making an examination.

Growth.—My mule colt, three years old, has a large wart on her head, in front of where the head-stall comes. It extends up to her left ear. A. C. H. Castor oil rubbed in once or twice daily in time does away with masses of small warts on the muz-zle, but would scarcely suffice for a large growth. It would be best to have the growth dissected out by a surgeon. If it is not cancerous it will not return, but cancer is not uncommon at the location mentioned. If you cannot have the operation performed, apply lard around the growth, make the part raw and rub in old powdered salammoniac.

rub in old powdered salammoniac.

RED MILK.—I buy milk. If I let it stand four or five days it turns a pink or rose color cream, and the sour milk is pinkish. What is the cause? I have had cows for years, but never saw milk turn pink. The milk is not very rich. Is it healthy? Mas. P. S.

A.—When the redness is not due to blood in the milk is caused by a micro-organism or germ known as bacilius prodigiosus, which is present in the milk utensils or the water with which they are washed. Most scrupulously cleanse and scald the milk vessels. If the trouble continues, sterilize the utensils with a solution of hypo-chlorite of soda used according to directions given by a creamery man.

gravel from your farm in Indiana.

Mrs. A. M., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a person by his will may disinherit his child or children living at the time of the execution of the will, but that where any person shall have made a will and shall afterwards marry or have a child or children not provided for in such will, and die leaving either a widow or child, such person shall be presumed to have died intestate as to the interest of the child or widow in his estate, and such widow, child or children shall be entitled to such shares of the estate as if he had actually died intestate.

T. M. E., Virginia.—We think it better that separate.

T. M. R., Virginia.—We think it better that separate tax bills be made out for the separate properties of the husband and wife, and that each pay their own taxes; we do not, however, think that the payment of taxes by the husband on the wife's property would alone establish title to the property in the husband, even though the tax receipt was made out to him.

Miss. M. A. H., Maryland.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man leaving a surviving widow and children or descendants, his widow is entitled to dower of a one third interest for life in his real estate and one third of the personal property, absolutely; that this share may be increased, but cannot be decreased by will; that the wife has no present interest in the husband's property during his lifetime, except that she is entitled and can compel him to support her, unless he is separated from her for good cause, or unless she abandons him without good cause, we think that under ordinary circumstances it would be an act of cruelty for him to compel her to turn over to a public institution, the grandchild she took as a baby, and might constitute a good cause for her to compel him to provide separate support for her.

T. D. L., Alabama.—Under the laws of Arkansas, we are of the opinion that, in the absence of a will, and in the absence of a legal adoption, you would have no interest in the estates of the persons who took you, when a little child, and brought you up, unless you are a near enough blood relative to come within the degrees of relationship to entitle you to a share as an heir at law or next of kin.

degrees of relationship to entitle you to a share as an heir at law or next of kin.

Mrs. M. D. H., Pennsylvania.—We do not think that the fact that the married couple you mention were married in another state under conditions which are not legally permitted in your state, would affect the validity of their marriage, provided they were legally married in the state where the ceremony was performed.

J. H., South Dakota.—The Constitution of the United States provides that all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States; we think this applies to the children of alien parents born here as well, and in the same manner as the children of citizens of the United States, except, of course, children of alien parents born in the United States in cases where such alien parents are not under the jurisdiction of this country; this would apply to the children of foreign diplomats born here, and children of alien parents born here while the parents were traveling or visiting here.

males under the age of twenty-one years.

Mrs. A. S., Missouri.—We do not think the children of your husband by a former marriage would be heirs of your estate under the laws of any state in the Union, except that in case your husband survives you and receives property from your estate all of his children would, of course, in turn be entitled to receive a share of his estate, unless he makes some other disposition by will; we think that if your husband is the beneficiary named in your life insurance policy in case he survives you, such of the proceeds as he may have at the time of his death, would be administered as his estate.

A. L. H., Indiana.—We think that Acts of Congress become effective either at the time of passage, or at the time stated in the bill.

J. C., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the mortgage you mention was legally foreclosed and the woman who gave the mortgage was the owner of the property in fee, the children of such woman would have no interest in the property.

J. C., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we think parents can disinherit children by will; we do not think your divorced husband is entitled to any part of your estate; we think to constitute a valid will the testator must possess testamentary capacity, must not be under undue influence, and that the bill must be legally drawn and executed, and must express testator's true intent.

Mrs. H. E. W., Wisconsin.—We think that if the deed, of the property you mention, has been recorded without the wife's signature, it would now be better to have her execute a release of dower in the property by separate instrument.

The movement was started in England in 1865 by William Booth, and the name of Salvation Army was adopted in 1878. The doctrines of the Salvation Army are in harmony with those of the orthodox churches, but its methods and system of government are different. The Salvation Army's work among prisons is well known, and an active field of operations is found in no less than sixty-three countries and colonies. In America the work is divided into two Departments—that of the East and that of the West. Headquarters are in New York and Chicago. M. S., Archbold, Ohio.—Oil, or rather petroleum, has been known since earliest times in various parts of the world—either by its appearance as a spring or by being found as a floating scum on the surface of streams and pools. It was known and used in Babylon and Nineveh. In Roman times it was obtained from Sicily and burned in lamps. In America, petroleum was first mentioned in a letter written in 1665 by a French missionary, who referred to springs found in what would now be northwestern Pennsylvania. Early settlers collected oil by digging wells and scooping out the liquid whick seeped in. Modern drilling for oil commenced about 1825. Petroleum is considered by geologists to be a result of the destructive distillation of vegetable matter contained in the rocks. Petroleum has been much used and appreciated by the Rockefeller family, and in one of its refined forms the oily product is of great value to all owners of Ford cars.

A. S., Springfield, La.—Modern mirrors are not backed with quicksilver, but with nitrate of silver, which makes a much better reflecting surface. The thoroughly cleansed glass is placed on a warm table and over it is poured a liquid made by dissolving nitrate of silver in ammonia—with a precipitating solution of tartaric acid. The heat helps the solution to adhere to the glass. Afterwards, a coat of shellac and then a coat of paint complete the process. By the quick-silver method the glass was first backed by sheets of tinfoll rubbed down smooth; it was then covered with quicksilver held in place by a woolen cloth weighted over the glass. After twenty-four hours the cloth was removed and the glass placed at an angle to permit the draining off of such of the solution as had not amalgamated with the tin. The quicksilver method has not been used since 1855.

Blug Eyes, Okla.—Poor little wife, only seventeen years old and now her husband doesn't love her or their baby girl. I am sorry for you, Blue Eyes, and would help you if I could, but if little girls are silly and run away and get married they almost always have to suffer for it. Be patient and good a while longer and perhaps everything will come out all right. I hope so. Be a good mother to your little girl. DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:
Will you kindly explain what all this German talk about freedom of the seas means. I suppose it is some tricky Prussian propaganda. I am an American girl of German parentage and Yankee Doodle right clean through. I am twenty-three years of age, five feet in height and have been in every state in the U.S.

few months should be sufficient proof that I was right. Here is a man who saw his mistake and who though over the draft age has gone to risk his life for an idea and a principle. In his heart is the Christ spirit. Right, righteousness, liberty and freedom and all those blessed and holy things which men hold dearer than life, can only be maintained by those who are ready to sacrifice their all that those things shall continue to exist. We were long in realizing this fact, but we are realizing it now. The old struggle between light and darkness, right and wrong has gone on all down the ages, the powers of darkness and tyranny must be crushed and once they are crushed the sword can be sheathed and the brotherhood of man and the Fatherhood of God will be realized. Tommy drew a long breath. The short sentences had come out in the singsong whine of the village school, exactly as if they had been learned by rote.

"Then you must be a fool!" he observed candidly. "Do you mean you don't want me to complain of the beast?"

Towers said no, still in that unnatural voice. "Go brek to the house and wash your face!" the other boy, who was but four years older, advised. "And if he beats you again, you come to me, and I'll settle him."

By using other makes of Iron Peptonate we could have put the same quantity of actual iron in the tablets at less than one-tourth the cost to us, and by using metallic iron we could have accomplished the same thing at less than one-twelfth the cost, but by so doing we must have most certainly impaired their therapeutic efficacy. Glycerophosphates used in Nuxated Iron is one of the most expensive tonic ingredients known. It is especially recommended to build up the nerve force and thereby increase brain power, as glycerophosphates are said to contain phosphorous in a state very similar to that in which it is found in the nerve and brain cells of man.

Seven Wheel Chairs in June 474 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

Seven chairs in June, following six in May and six in April, is doing very well, but let us try to better this record in July.

The seven June wheel chairs go, one to a charitable institution and six to shut-ins, as follows, the figures after their names indicating the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for Ward D, Eastern Maine General Hospital, Bangor, Maine, 204; Raymond Cassidy, Coal Grove, Ohio, 187; Davie Gifford Goodnight, Kempton, Ind., 155; Jessie Lee Bright, R. R. I, Borden Springs, Ala, i33 Mrs. Louisa Myers, Seale, La., 128; Willie Price. R. R. I. Box 101, Crabtree, N. C., 128; Mrs. Roy Wilson, R. R. 2, Mayfield, Ga., 125.

Ward D is a women's ward in the Eastern Maine General Hospital. Mrs. M. Blanche Jamieson, of Millinocket, Maine, procured the entire 204 subscriptions and donated the chair to the institution for the special use of the patients in Ward D. The friends of other hospitals and charitable institutions would serve their community interests well by following her example.

Raymond Cassidy, age 12, an invalid from birth due to spinal trouble, has been unable to walk the past two years. The subscriptions for Raymond's chair were procured by his sister, Miss Fannie Cassidy.

Davie G. Goodnight, age 10, is completely paralyzed in his lower limbs but can use his hands. There are three other small children in the family and the chair will be a great help to his mother in caring for him.

Jessie Lee Bright, age 12, has never been able to walk, due to paralysis of her right side which com-pletely cripples her right leg and right arm. Mrs. Louisa Myers, age 57, widow, is practically helpless as her left side is wholly paralyzed. Willie Price, age 20, has been crippled by rheumatism for eight years and has no use of his lower limbs which are badly drawn up.

Mrs. Roy Wilson, age 27, suffers severely from rheumatism which has so crippled her lower limbs that she is unable to stand. As she has to remain alone while her husband is at work the wheel chair will be a great help and relief in enabling her to get about.

A lot of other crippled, helpless shut-ins are suf-fering for COMFORT wheel chairs. Help us to sup-ply the needs of a goodly number of them the coming month.

Because the subscription price of COMFORT goes to 35 cents a year on the first day of July, I have to revise my wheel-chair offer accordingly.

My standing offer has been to give a wheel chair for 200 subscriptions at 25 cents each, and this offer holds good for all wheel-chair subscriptions mailed

But beginning with July first, the subscription price will be 35 cents, and I will give a wheel chair for 150 subscriptions at the new 35-cent rate, although the wheel chairs now cost me nearly one half more than they did two years ago.

Those who are trying to earn a wheel chair for themselves or for a friend, and have sent in subscriptions at the 25-cent rate before July first should continue their efforts after that date by getting subscriptions at the 35-cent rate; and they may rely on my assurance to make not only a fair but a liberal adjustment in their favor. All those that they have sent in at the old rate before July first will stand to their credit and a proportionately larger credit will be given them for such as they send in at the 35-cent rate after that date. In other words, they will finish by earning their chairs with a smaller number of subscriptions than would be required at the old rate. If this is not perfectly clear, do not hesitate to write me, and I will inform you just how you stand on the wheel-chair account.

As to new applicants, who make their first start on or after July first, 150 subscriptions at 35 cents each will earn a wheel chair for them.

I cannot spare the space for letters of thanks, but we have an interesting Roll of Honor this month.

I wish to acknowledge with thanks the generous contribution of $9.60 cash to the general wheel-chair fund by Mrs. N. J. Gerber, of Schrag, Washington. This is equivalent to 77 subscriptions and was credited as such for the benefit of the shut-ins in the award of the May wheel chairs, and mention should have been made in the Roll of Honor last month; also $1.00 contributed by an unnamed friend in Friendswood, Texas. Various smaller sums in cash have been contributed by others.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 35 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premaums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours. Any shut-in who has friends to help him get subscriptions can obtain a wheel chair free, Write me for information.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. A WESTERN GIRL, Havre, Mont.—If you are but eighteen, it is perhaps well that your marriage should not take place for two years. One reason why long engagements are to be avoided is that the couple are kept in an unsettled state, and there is always a possibility of changes of heart, health, or finance breaking up what might have gone happily forward if more promptly accomplished. But you will not believe this. We fear.

C. K., Darlington, Ind.—Even though the party was held at the house of this young man, it was permissible for him to accompany you home, and he should have offered to do this when you had no other escort. It would have been perfectly proper for you to have aided his thoughtlessness by asking him to see you back to your own house. But if his mother or sisters invited you to remain all night, he has no cause to be offended—particularly as it was his own fault.

D. D., Ashboro, N. C.—You are right not to let boys kss you in the way that your friend allows them to do. It is permissible to accompany a caller to the door, unless you wish to appear exceedingly formal. You are very wise to plan to secure a better education, and you will never regret that you made the necessary sacrifice.

GOLDIE MAY, Clarksville, Ark.—If you are walking with a girl, and it becomes dark, you may ask her if she wishes to take your arm.

she wishes to take your arm.

Two Montana Kids, Victor, Mont.—A girl should have finished school, and be at least eighteen before she should spend any time about thinking about "going with boys." (2) The professor in your school has the right to govern your actions while in the building or in his charge. We cannot answer more definitely than this because we are not informed of your exact cause for complaint. Suppose you talk it over with your parrents, if you have not already done so.

B. L. Pilot Mountain, Tenn—It has been appropried.

B. L., Pilot Mountain, Tenn.—It has been announced officially that the government is not in favor of somany strangers writing to boys in the army and navy. We certainly could not recommend that you, a fifteen-year-old girl, should start a correspondence with a man that you had never seen.

PUZZLEO GIRL, Kennet, Mo.—A young girl should not write to two soldiers, one of whom is divorced, and the other whom she has not senn. See answer to B. L. in this column.

IENNY AND PEGGY, Anamoose, N. Dak.—Here are two foolish letters from girls to whom we can only say that they are too young to write otherwise but in a silly fashion about boys. What are your mothers thinking of to allow these boys to act in this fashion when they come to see you?

L. A. D., Seattle, Wash.—You may give this girl of eighteen a book or a box of candy upon her birth-day. Remember that a girl accepts only the most sim-ple gifts from a man to whom she is not engaged.

Two High School Girls, Nampa, Idaho,—It is a girl's prerogative to go with as many different boys as she may wish to—and is able. And this refers to "quitting" them, also. But it is not a boy's right to hug and kiss every girl he goes with, and you must put a stop to any such freedom when it is offered.

MIKE, Bethesda, O.—Write to no soldiers that you have never met. The government does not encourage such correspondence. (2) You may write friendly, sensible letters to this other boy if your parents do not object. But no auto rides at night. And remember you are but a school girl.

TEXAS ROSERED, Hemingway, S. C.—A fifteen-year-old girl should not take any time from her books to correspond with nineteen-year-old boys. (2) If you have another partner, simply state the fact. (3) We cannot tell if the boy, who was angry fit not becoming your escort, eares for you; but we can easily tell that he has bad manners.

TROUBLED GILL, Hemingway, S. C.—You will find that you will be happier by doing as your father wishes even if he at times seems harsh. We think that the "nice young man of twenty" with whom you wish to correspond, would be disappointed in your spelling. Why not spend a little time on this and not think so much about the boy question for a year or two?

Brown Eyes, Flat River, Mo.—If an automobile is crowded beyond its seating capacity, a young man can stand upon the running board at the side. In any case, it is the man's place to assume the most uncomfortable position. In such a situation as you mention, we think you could arrange to sit upon the lap of a girl friend.

TWO SAMMIES, Mich.—Here is a silly question about what to do if a boy and girl like each other but are both bashful. All we can say is to wait until they know each other well enough to get over being so bashful. (2) Ride in his automobile if you wish, but no night riding.

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.
Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

T. T. E., Whistle, Ala.—Comfort has recommended many times the use of American Oil to be taken in teaspoonful doses with the meals for both constipation and the resultant intestinal gas and more, or less mucous in the stools. For the constipation, if pronounced, use two compound cathartic pills at night. The use of any sleeping potion is to be discontinued, especially of a habit-forming drug.

B. A. Sheridan III.—American Oil is not a parameter.

B. A., Sheridan, Ill.—American Oil is not a patent medicine. It can be obtained at any drug store.

Miss E. H., Price, N. C.—The itching may be due to pin-worms affecting the parts. If so, an enema of salt in hot water will cure you. Use only a teaspoonful to the pint or even weaker. You can also use locally compound gall ointment, which can be obtained at your local druggist's. Apply the ointment at night

M. Furrow, Oregon, for General, 5; Miss Mary Clemmons, Ga., for Mrs. Roy Wilson, 5.

Miss M. E. D., Waterloo, Wis.—Cleanse the parts with tar soap, and apply a solution of salicylic acid to the arm pits. One per cent. solution in water will be strong enough. Use only twice a week.

MRS. M. S., Manchester, Ohio.—The moles can be safely and effectually removed by the actual cautery or liquid snow. Both must be used by a physician only. Mis. F. M., Waupaca, Wis.—From what you write, you may have several adhesions following your operations. The only way of handling these is by another operation. Adhesions of this kind will cause all kinds of symptoms and pains, even in remote parts. You should take high up saline enemas for the intestinal mucous you pass with your stools.

mucous you pass with your stools.

MRS. C. McCox, S. D.—Your daughter is possibly suffering from a dislocated cartilage in the knee joint. An operation is indicated in that case.

MISS F. L. C., Lenoir, N. C.—Curvature of the spine should have surgical treatment. The sooner the better. Curvatures are now cured by operation on the spine. If the operation is not indicated, the use of a spinal support is indicated. This must be applied by a competent surgeon.

MRS. W. I. B., Bowling Green, Ky.—You have the same tendency that your parents have. The cause of the paralysis should be gotten at, from the history of your parents' illness and by the examination of your own blood.

own blood.

Miss. M. A. G., Cincinnati, Ohio.—You should, at the age of eighty-one, be glad that you are in fairly good health. Your skin is wrinkled from the absorption of fat that comes with age. Massage with cold cream wilhhelp smooth out the wrinkles, and possibly plump up your face. Your son should wear a truss, and as soon as he can, have a radical operation performed for the cure of the rupture.

Miss. L. B., Hoskins, Nebr.—The turn in the eye is due to unequal vision in the eyes. If the vision is not the same, the poorer eye crosses to get rid of double vision. The children should consult a good eye-doctor and have glasses prescribed at once, to be worn indefinitely.

B. B. H. Petersburg Tages.

and nave gusses prescribed at once, to be worn indefinitely.

B. B. H., Petersburg, Tenn.—Would advise the usual operation for the trouble mentioned. You should let the ovaries alone. Operation on the ovaries is not dangerous in your case, but is inadvisable.

MR. G. C. F., Weimar, Texas.—There is nothing to whiten the skin, that would be of lasting duration. The skin of the hands is colored and has much to do with one's occupation. A good soaking in hot water, to which a good soap is added, will deas much to soften and whiten the skin as anything. The wearing of gloves at work will also help.

MRS. L. A. P., Richmond, Va.—Varicose veins, such as you describe, should be operated on and a radical cure effected. If this is not possible, use an elastic bandage, applying it to the leg before rising in the morning and removing it at night after retiring, or while in bed.

MRS. J. W. H., Butte, Mont.—The lump in your

MES. J. W. H., Butte, Mont.—The lump in your breast has nothing to do with your indigestion. It should have surgical attention at once. Lumps in the breast are always dangerous and require radical treatment.

Miss E. C., Pencerville, Ill.—Tuberculosis is very contagious in the average case, especially if there is no effort made to protect the average individual who must come in contact with it. It can be carried in the clothes, through dried sputum, and also in the dust of the room. There should be no kissing in cases of this kind.

Mr. G. S., Kendish, Colo.—Would not advise either the toupe or wig. The wig is the only thing you can use, owing to the loss of so much of your hair, but it is heating and you will lose the hair you now have. The wig is stuck on by some non-irritating preparation. There is nothing to bring back the hair, where the roots are dead.

are dead.

MRS. A. P., New Haven, Ili.—Use the regular sulphar ointment for the itch. Apply three times, at night, to the entire body, then take a warm bath. Burn or boil your clothes, and apply simple vaseline, to the skin. If this does not cure, repeat the sulphur ointment again after two weeks.

MRS. T. W., Junction City, Oregon.—You are troubled with internal hemorrhoids, and you should consult a good surgeon and have them removed by operation. Your child should have only the simplest food at night, and in this way you will probably control the night terrors. Also look out for adenoids and enlarged tonsils. If present, have them removed at once.

MRS. G. O. C., Cliff Island, Maine.—Use an ointment of ten per cent. ichthyol. Apply at night to the inflamed parts of the "milk fig." In the daytime bandage the leg with a flannel bandage from the foot up.

See The Wonders Of War Through The Pan-Chro Scope!

F you have ever been to the "movies" and watched the magnident spectacle of a fleet of Uncle Sam's huge battleships under full speed—or a thrilling infantry charge "over the top"—or gazed upon the melancholy ruins of a Belgian village—then you have some idea of what, you see when you look at the same scene through the Pan-Chro Scope, only of course the objects are stationary—not moving.

The Pan-Chro Scope is a new invention—something like the stereoscope, but larger and more powerful, being fitted with twin stereo-lens of wonderful magnifying power. The war views are taken with a specially constructed double lens camera. On the back of each view is printed a complete and accurate description of the scene represented. You place the view in the Scope, adjust the focus to fit your eyes, and immediately you find yourself face to face with an astonishing lifelike scene that resembles a section of a moving-picture film. One moment you are on the deck of an American warship;—the next moment ing-picture film. One moment you are on the deck of an American warship;—the next moment you are "somewhere in France" looking into a trench where an anti-aircraft gun is working;—next you find yourself among the barbed wire entanglements in "No Man's Land;"—again you are watching fierce house-to-house fighting in a captured town, Belgian field artillery in action on the firing line, and many other scenes of actual warfare just as interesting and exciting.

The different views take you direct to Belgium, to France, or wherever the place may be, and show you the scenes just as plainly as though you were there yourself.

48 Views Free With The Scope!

New views for the Pan-Chro Scope are con-antly coming out and we have made arrangestantly coming out and we have made arrangements to send you a set of forty-eight views free with the Scope. Think of it! Forty-eight gennine war views—all different. Among them you will find such scenes as:
